PREFACE.

PREFACE.

I.

This volume contains the Exchequer Accounts extant from Martinmas 1507 to Whitsunday 1513, with the rentals of the Royal Lands and the Responde Books for the same period. The present Editor is responsible only for the Preface and the revisal of the Index. Both Text and Index were left complete by the late Mr George Burnett, who had also prepared for the press the text of the next volume. Mr Burnett undertook the editorship of the Exchequer Rolls on the death of Dr John Stuart in 1878, before the publication of the first volume, and by unremitting labour, continued till within a week of his own death, on 23rd January 1890, conducted twelve complete volumes through the press, commencing with the year 1264, the fifteenth year of Alexander III., and ending with the year 1507, the nineteenth year of James IV. To each volume he prefixed a concise yet comprehensive Preface, describing the principal illustrations, corrections, and additions the Rolls afford for the history of Scotland during nearly two centuries and a half from the War of Independence to the commencement of the events which led to the campaign of Flodden. Taken together, these Prefaces form the most exact account yet written of this period of Scottish history. It may be said without exaggeration that the Rolls edited by Mr Burnett, along with the other Record publications edited by the late Professor Cosmo Innes and Mr Hill Burton, the Reverend Father Stevenson, Professor Masson, Mr Thomas Dickson, Mr Bain, Mr Balfour Paul, Lyon King of Arms, and Mr Maitland Thomson, advocate, and issued under the direction of the Lord and Deputy Clerk Register, render a revised history of Scotland at once possible and necessary. Eminent as has been the series of Scottish historians, the contents of the Scottish Records have not until now been fully known. Much still remains to be done to elucidate from Record sources the Continental Relations of Scotland, which were more important so long as it remained a separate State, and cannot be adequately explained as a mere supplement to those of England. But its Internal Affairs, so far as the Records extant allow, have now been or are in the course of being placed by these publications within reach of historical students. Mr Burnett's Prefaces are specially valuable for the reigns of the first four Jameses, for which there is no Scottish historian or chronicler who can be called contemporary in the proper sense; and they supplement and correct in important particulars the early chronicles of Wyntoun and Fordoun, and the later histories of Mair, Boece, Leslie, and Buchanan. They afford a model of historical research, which it would be desirable, but will be hardly possible, for the continuator of Mr Burnett's work to copy. It will be long before any scholar approaches the task of editing the Scottish Records with the rare and happy combination of talents which Mr Burnett possessed. An accurate genealogist, an accomplished herald, a learned and unbiased peerage lawyer, with fuller knowledge than many of the judges who have decided Scottish peerage cases, he did not allow his learning in these recondite departments to divert his attention from the wider and more important field of National History. On the contrary, he brought them all into its service. In Scottish history such side studies, as the Germans call them, are more than ordinarily valuable. The national history of a small country like Scotland is often interwoven with the domestic relations of the same families. The annals of some of the noble houses are at certain periods almost as important as the annals of the Kings, and during the feudal era a knowledge of heraldry cannot be neglected with impunity. Well known as Mr Burnett was to contemporary and younger students in Scotland, he was less known than he deserved to be to a large portion of the public interested in history. This was partly due to natural modesty, partly to the comparative, and, it may be hoped, temporary underestimate of the value of historical inquiries in Scotland. It is fitting that the edition of the Exchequer Rolls to which he gave so much of his life should bear witness to his self-sacrificing labours. The present Editor has, so far as he could, endeavoured to follow in Mr Burnett's steps, so that there may be, at least in the method and form of publication, as little breach of continuity as possible between the earlier volumes and those he has undertaken to see through the press.

The accounts of the Custumars and Bailies of Burghs for the period contained in this volume are complete. The accounts of the Bailies ad extra, audited in the year 1511, are missing, but those audited in the years 1508, 1509, 1510, 1512, and 1513 are practically complete. There are no accounts of the Sheriffs, but the Controllers' rendered by James Redheuch for 1508,[1] and by Sir Duncan Forestare of Garden for 1509,[2] contain a statement of the balances received from the Sheriffs. In the latter the Sheriff of Argyle appears for the first time as accounting for the royal revenue in some of the western islands.[3] James's expeditions to the West Highlands had at last succeeded in establishing Royal Officers and Courts for the administration of justice as well as the collection of the revenue in that troublesome part of his dominions. It was no longer necessary to provide, as in the statute of 1503,[1] that the Justice Ayre for Argyle should be held in Perth when the "Kingis grace pleses, sa that every ilk Helandman and Laulandman may cum and ask and have justice." Yet the Accounts show that this improvement was limited to Kintyre and the southern Isles of Mull, Tiree, and the adjacent small islands. Skye, the Long Island, and the Lewis still lay practically beyond the reach of the royal warrant, unless supported by armed forces.

Edinburgh, after 1508, and during the period embraced in this volume, became the sole place of audit. Early in the next reign, Sir David Lyndsay writes of it in the "Complaynt of the Papingo"—

> "Of trew merchandis, the rute of this region, > Moste reddy to resave Court, King, and Quene."

But already, under James IV., Edinburgh had become the undisputed Capital of the Kingdom. In the earlier years of the reign the Accounts were audited at Stirling and Linlithgow, as well as Edinburgh. The expense of transferring the Rolls, books, and papers of the Exchequer from one place to another[2] may have been one reason for this change. But it was chiefly due to a more general cause—the centralisation of government, which led to the establishment of the Supreme Civil Court a few years earlier in Edinburgh, and made Holyrood a more frequent residence of James in the latter portion of his reign, though he continued to visit the older Palaces of Stirling, Linlithgow, and Falkland. The removal of the Office or Court of Exchequer from the house of Sir Adam Crichton[1] to the Dominican Convent in Edinburgh, for which a rent of £10 a year was paid, and the addition to the ordinary annual allowances for the table, greencloth, wax, parchment, and paper, of a payment for Chests[2] to hold the Rolls and Books of Exchequer, as well as the Books of the King's Household, and for the key of a house,[3] are perhaps indications that the Exchequer had now a more permanent habitation. The appearance of a chaplain, as well as players,[4] attached to the Exchequer, and the appointment of additional officers besides the ordinary copying-clerks, prove the increase of its business, and that those who discharged it required a larger office and staff, who had time for amusement, and religious as well as official duties. The Audit of the year 1509 occupied two months, from 11th June to 13th August, instead of three to five weeks as in the fourteenth century.[5] After it was completed, the Rolls were returned, however, to the Castle of Edinburgh for safe custody. The subsequent history of Scotland showed that no other place, even in the metropolis, was secure either from domestic treason or foreign invasion.'

The Lords Auditors of the Exchequer are not named in the first three years, but in 1511 a full list is given. It includes the principal Officers of State, Prelates, and Nobles. William Elphinstone, Bishop of Aberdeen, Keeper of the Privy Seal; David Arnot, Bishop of Candida Casa or Galloway, and of the Chapel Royal; Andrew Stewart, Bishop of Caithness, Treasurer; George Hepburn, Bishop of Sodor or the Isles; the Prior of St Andrews; the Abbots of Holyrood and Jedburgh, represent the clergy. Archibald, Earl of Angus, Lord Douglas (Bell the Cat); Archibald, Earl of Argyle, Lord Campbell and Lorn; Matthew, Earl of Lennox, Lord Darnley; Andrew Lord Avondale, represent the nobility. Gavin Dunbar, Archdeacon of St Andrews, Principal Clerk of the Rolls, Register and Council and Secretary of the King, Patrick Panther, King's Secretary, Robert Colville of Ochiltree, Director of Chancery, Sir John Ramsay of Trarinyian, Robert Foreman, Dean of Glasgow, and Cuthbert Baillie, Rector of Sanquhar,[1] were the officials who in that year formed this numerous and important Court. The practical work was naturally left to the officials last named in the Commission.[2] The Prelates and Nobles were added

[2] They were all men of marked ability. Gavin Dunbar succeeded Elphinstone as Bishop of Aberdeen in the reign of James v.; Patrick Panther was one of the best scholars of the time. The best notice of his life is in Ruddiman's Preface to to give the Exchequer dignity, but one of them—probably the Treasurer—acted as Chairman, and all who conveniently could attended the meetings. Several of the Auditors, as the Bishop of Caithness and the Earl of Argyle, had to render as well as audit accounts, and would no doubt attend the diets when their respective accounts were audited. In the list for 1512, Alexander, Archbishop of St Andrews, Chancellor, the King's illegitimate son; James Beaton, Archbishop of Glasgow; Andrew Foreman, Bishop of Moray, Commendator of Dryburgh and Pittenweem, and of Cottingham in England, Sir Alexander Lauder, Provost of Edinburgh; James Henderson of Fordell, Clerk of Justiciary; and John Murray of Blackbarony, are added. The Bishop of The Isles and the Earl of Angus are omitted. Possibly the omission of Angus, who was opposed to the policy that led to war with England, of which Andrew Foreman, Bishop of Moray, was the chief supporter, indicates that he had already begun to lose favour with the King. In 1513 the Auditors are not named, and perhaps may not have been altered.

There are a few special accounts in this volume which may be here briefly noted, as their Epistolæ Regum Scotorum vol. II. Robert Colville is often mentioned in the Treasurer's Accounts as a familiar servant of James; Sir John Ramsay was the forfeited Lord Bothwell, the favourite of James III., who was rehabilitated in 1497, and given a grant of various lands, though his peerage was not restored, and he was in fact in the pay of Henry VII.; Robert Foreman was a kinsman of Andrew, the Bishop of Moray; Cuthbert Baillie became Treasurer in 1512.

contents will be more particularly examined later.

In 1508 there is an account by Duncan Forestare of Garden, described as "Provisor Domine Reginæ,"[1] or Purveyor to Our Lady the Queen, which gives the expenses of her household from 25th January to 4th August in that year. In 1509 the same officer, under the name of Controller, includes in his account the expenses of the King's[2] and also of the Queen's household from 1st September 1508 to 1st August 1509. These accounts, together with the entries by various other accountants of payments and deliveries which are said to be entered in the "Libri Domicilii Regis,"[3] and relate either to his expenses or those of the Queen, furnish valuable information as to the mode of life of James and Margaret, and enable us, though no doubt imperfectly, to estimate the cost of the Court. They require to be supplemented by the accounts of the Treasurer, which include some of the most important items of expenditure. Unfortunately the Treasurer's Accounts for the period from August 1508 to August 1511 are wanting. James had to resort to every expedient possible to raise money—the rigid enforcement of the Casualty of Ward, the revival of the Casualty of

[3] A fragment of the Libri Domicili of 1512 has been preserved, of which two pages are given in Facsimile National Manuscripts of Scotland, vol. iii., No. 10, and there are two lists of the Royal Household in the Controllers' Accounts for 1499 and 1500, vol. xi., pp. 244 and 255.

Recognition,[1] the exaction of grassums or fines, and the enhancing of the rents of the royal lands, as well as gifts or loans from the French King and others.[2] He had even, according to the account of an English envoy, to pawn his jewels. The references to the accounts in the Libri Domicilii are the more important, as the Household Books of the Scottish Kings have not been preserved prior to those of James v., excerpts from which have been printed by the Bannatyne Club.[3]

The accounts of the Earldom of Sutherland for the year 1510, rendered by Andrew, Bishop of Caithness, as Chamberlain, merit particular attention.[4] Unfortunately they are not extant for the rest of the period during which that Earldom was in non-entry, owing to the mental infirmity of John, the 13th Earl, or, as the Record expresses it, "the non-entry of the true heir not prosecuting his right."

The accounts of the Lordship of the Isles, rendered in 1509, which now for the first time contain Mull, Tiree, and Morvern, the district between Loch Sunart and Loch Nell, as well as the account of North and South Kintyre and Isla, which had begun to be rendered since 1505 by the Earl of Argyle as Chamberlain, also deserve notice.[1] The lands of Mull and their owners are stated with a minuteness which enables us to picture the condition of that island, and supplement what is known from other sources of its reduction to royal authority; but space prevents their detailed examination. Probably the most interesting special matter in this volume is to be found in the royal rentals, particularly those of Fife, which give the means of tracing the general introduction of feu-farm holding, and the precise nature of the change from tenancy by lease or at will to this form of feudal tenure in a manner that has not hitherto been possible.

II.

The five years from 1508 to 1513 included in these accounts were the years of the decline of James IV., preceding and leading to the defeat of Flodden on 19th September 1513, a catastrophe which falls just beyond the period covered by this volume. In 1507 his reign had reached its zenith. Monarch of one of the smallest, and, as these accounts vividly show, one of the poorest countries in Europe, he had been courted by its greatest sovereigns. Ferdinand and Isabella had sought his hand for a Spanish princess, and when that project failed, promoted his marriage with Margaret Tudor, sister of their daughter's spouse, Prince Arthur of England, who became on his death the wife of his brother Henry. Henry VII. had almost converted the long-standing enmity between England and Scotland into friendship by the marriage of Margaret and James. Louis XII., notwithstanding the English marriage treaty, still counted Scotland his ancient and surest ally. James corresponded with the Emperor Maximilian on equal terms. The Pope sent him a special blessing with the present of a hat and sword. He had played the part so flattering to his pride of the protector of minor powers. His uncle Hans, King of Denmark, was indebted to him for timely aid during the rebellion of his Swedish subjects and against the attacks of the Hanse towns of the Baltic.[1] The Duke of Gueldres had been saved by his intercession from the invasion of the Archduke of Austria. The Republic of Venice, as well as Louis XII., promised to aid him in his cherished project of a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and at a somewhat later date even offered him the command of its forces.[2] Irish chiefs, O'Donnell of Tyrconnel in Ulster, the Earls of Desmond and Kildare in the South, had frequent dealings with him just as the Lord of the Isles and some West Highland chiefs had with the English King. He had remonstrated with Immanuel the Fortunate of Portugal, against the piracy of his subjects, and when remonstrance failed, he with more success granted letters of reprisal to the Bartons, who brought to the havens of the Forth some of the spoils of the Indies. Nor had his domestic affairs been less fortunate. He easily put down at the commencement of his reign the rebellion of Lennox and Lyle, and with somewhat more difficulty crushed the rising of the Western Isles under Donald Dubh. By prudent policy and liberal grants he had gained over the chiefs of powerful clans. In the west the Macleans of Mull, the MacIans of Ardnamurchan, the M^{c}Leods of Skye, and the Stewarts of Appin had submitted to the royal authority. Archibald Campbell, Earl of Argyle, was laying the foundations of his rapidly-growing house as the Royal Lieutenant. In the north the Gordons of Huntly, the Sutherland Earls of Sutherland, the Mackays of Strathnaver, and the Sinclairs of Orkney and Caithness became steady supporters of the King.

By the raid of Eskdale, and frequent Justice Ayres at Jedburgh, Lochmaben, and Dumfries, he had kept in check the most lawless part of his own borders. Many of the great earldoms of former times had been destroyed or reduced by the policy of his predecessors, continued by himself. The lands of the Earldoms of Fife,[1] of Strathearn and Menteith,[2] of Moray,[3] of the greater part of Mar,[4] some of the best portions and strongest forts of the border lands of the older Earls of Douglas, and their successors, the Earls of March[5] had been annexed to the Crown. Ross had fallen into his hands by the forfeiture of the last earl and the renunciation of his brother, who chose, or had chosen for him, an ecclesiastical career. Orkney and Shetland had been pledged for his mother's dowry, with little likelihood of redemption, for Denmark was a poorer country even than Scotland. The King collected their revenues through Henry, Lord Sinclair, as tacksman.[6] James Beaton, Abbot of Dunfermline, afterwards Bishop of Galloway and Glasgow, as his chamberlain, collected the rents of Fife ;[7] the Earl of Argyle those of Cowal, Roseneath, Kintyre, Mull, and Tiree ;[8] Lord Hume those of the Earldom of March,[9] the Forest of Ettrick[10] and the Barony of Halyburton[11] in Angus ; the Bishop of Moray, those of Dunbar ;[12] the Bishop of Caithness, those of Ross[13] and Ardmanach,[14] and for a time Sutherland ;[15] Stirling, and Linlithgowshires were Crown lands ;

so were the Lordships of Galloway and Bute. Besides these he had wards of smaller estates. The chief nobles who succeeded to the places, but not to the full power of the older nobility, were wisely employed in the royal service. He had many able counsellors from the Commons—Sir Andrew Wood and the Bartons for naval affairs; Sir John Sandilands of Hillhouse, Robert Borthwick, Hans the Fleming, and others, for the artillery. The clergy of lower rank than the Bishops—Gavin Dunbar, Robert Foreman, and Cuthbert Baillie, along with Lauder the Provost of Edinburgh, Colville the Director of Chancery, Henderson of Fordell the Justice-Clerk, and Murray of Blackbarony, aided him by their knowledge in different branches of the revenue.

He had centralised civil justice by the institution of the Daily Council at Edinburgh, and the business of the Exchequer by fixing its audit in the same town. He had brought the west and north within the jurisdiction of Justiciary Circuits at Tarbert, Inverness, and Dingwall; and appointed Sheriffs for Argyle, Ross, and Caithness. His chief advisers were the great ecclesiastics—Robert Blackader, Archbishop of Glasgow, and his successor, James Beaton, Abbot of Dunfermline; William Elphinstone, Bishop of Aberdeen; Andrew Stewart, Bishop of Caithness; Andrew Foreman, Bishop of Moray. By obtaining for his bastard, Alexander Stewart, the primacy of St Andrews after the death of the Duke of Ross, the revenues and influence of that See were under his control. No ambitious prelate could hope to rise to a dangerous eminence. Yet though James listened to the counsel of others, it was the remark of more than one of those who observed him narrowly that he generally followed his own opinion. He was the most independent and powerful monarch since Robert Bruce who had sat on the Scottish throne.

James possessed many royal qualities. He was an exact administrator of justice, an able legislator and diplomatist, a protector of the poor from the oppression of the nobles, a friend of the Church, through piety as well as superstition. He promoted education by the foundation of King's College at Aberdeen, and the confirmation of his son's foundation of St Leonards at St Andrews. The celebrated law belongs to his reign which required the sons of all freeholders to proceed to the universities to learn law after completing their education in Latin at school, and he set the example by sending sons of the Western Islanders to college.[1] He introduced the printing press, and was the patron both of literature and science, paying special attention to medicine and surgery,[2] which he practised as an amateur. His inquiring mind was keenly interested in experiments of all sorts—the origin of language; the transmutation of metals; the alchemy and astrology of an age in which science was in search of but had not found its true methods. He was fond of architecture, music, and poetry, like his father, but unlike his father did not allow these tastes to enervate him. He was equally, possibly more, devoted to all that bore on the art of war; the improvement of artillery and of shipbuilding; the tournament and the wapinschaw; hawking, hunting, riding, and all athletic exercises. In more than one point he resembled his contemporary the Emperor Maximilian, who had the military spirit of the feudal monarch with the æsthetic culture of the Renaissance king. He was probably the most active man in his dominions, both in mind and body.

Yet with all the appearance and much of the reality of prosperity there were elements of weakness both in his surroundings and his character. His Queen, owing to her premature marriage, had borne him no heir who survived infancy, and the question of the royal succession must have been as urgent in Scotland as in England under Henry VIII. and Elizabeth. His treasury was exhausted by lavish expenditure in ships and guns, in tournaments and entertainments, as well as by gifts to courtiers and parasites, both lay and ecclesiastical. His country was too small for the part he was ambitious of playing as one of the great potentates of Europe. Possessing such ambition he could not avoid, sooner or later, involving his kingdom in the conflict still pending between France and England, and the shifting turns of European politics. The Ancient League, and long friendship cemented by mutual good offices, bound Scotland to France. His marriage, the greater similarity of customs, and a language practically identical, as well as commercial and social interests, attracted it to England. The clue to Scottish history during the mediæval and post-mediæval period is that Scotland swayed between the influence of the two great rivals, and that the English influence gradually but surely became predominant. At the point of time now reached the crisis was approaching when it was necessary for the Scottish monarch to make his choice. Unfortunately, but not unnaturally, James made the wrong choice, and determined to side with France, a weaker ally and a less dangerous enemy.

The personal capacity of James was also inadequate to the position he coveted. He had been singularly successful in home government and domestic war, but he had no thorough knowledge of foreign affairs, no experience in foreign war. A fatal flaw ran through his character, and rendered his good qualities of no effect. He was restless, inconstant, vainglorious, rash, and obstinate. Though he reached the age of majority in 1494 he never ceased to be a headstrong youth rather than a mature man.

In 1508 and following years the mortality, which led Dunbar to compose his poem on "The Death of the Makaris," came very near the royal house. The first-born child of Margaret died on 17th February 1508, within a year of birth; the second, a girl, within the same year; the third, Arthur, in October 1510. Her father, Henry VII., died on 21st April 1509, and within a few weeks her grandmother, the good Margaret, Countess of Richmond, by whom she had been brought up, followed her son to the grave. These accounts furnish one, no doubt not a solitary instance, of the celebration of a requiem for Henry VII. by the Friars Observant at Ayr.[1] The frequent pilgrimages to St Ninians at Whithern and St Duthacs at Tain, so marked a feature in the life of James, were the efforts of a superstitious mind to procure the Divine aid for himself, his family, and his kingdom. Before the death of Henry VII. the relations between the Courts of England and Scotland had suffered a strain. Henry's pacific disposition alone prevented a breach. The Earl of Arran, who had gone to France without a safe conduct, was detained in England on his return in January 1508, but after some delay was allowed to go home. Sir Robert Ker of Fernieside, Warden of the Middle Marches, was slain on a day of truce by Lilburn, Starkhed, and Heron, a bastard brother of Heron of Ford, the English Warden. Henry surrendered Lilburn, and gave up Heron of Ford as a hostage for his brother, who as well as Starkhed escaped. The succession of Henry VIII. introduced new disputes, and aggravated the old. That monarch refused to deliver the jewels left to Queen Margaret by his father's will. In August 1511, Andrew Barton, who had not spared English ships or goods in his reprisals against the Portuguese, was slain by Sir Edward Howard in the Downs. To the remonstrance of James, Henry's answer was that kings should not debate about pirates. Heron, the bastard, and Starkhed having left their hiding-places on Henry's accession, the latter was surprised and killed by the retainers of Andrew, son of Sir Robert Ker, and his head exposed on the walls of Edinburgh Castle, but Heron, the bastard, remained at large. Yet these ruptures of the truce might not have led to war had not Henry determined to invade France, and James decided to renew his league with the French King. So early as the end of March 1508 an English envoy (West, according to Pinkerton,[1] but no other than Wolsey,[2] as Mr Gairdner infers from the handwriting of the scroll despatch[3]) had been sent to James by Henry VII. to prevent the renewal of the French alliance, but left without any satisfactory answer. D'Aubigny, the French envoy, was daily expected, but had not arrived; and James, pretending ignorance of the cause of his embassy, promised to send the Bishop of Moray on a secret mission to Henry, explaining the object of the French mission.

The account rendered by the Controller in 1508 enables us to fix the exact date of D'Aubigny's arrival and death, for he includes amongst his expenses a sum of £1083, 7s. 7d. for the entertainment of "Berald, Count of Belmont, Lord of Aubigny, and the Lord President of the Parliament of Paris,[1] with sixty persons in their suite, from 9th May to 1st July 1508, although the said Berald died on 11th June."[2] Belmont, or Beaumont le Roger, was a fief in Normandy, which he had received in 1483 from Louis XI., in addition to the lordship of Aubigny in Berry, granted to his grandfather, John Stewart of Darnley. D'Aubigny and Sellat came by way of London, which they reached on 21st March, and left on 27th of the same month.[3] Sir John Stirling acted as their purveyor while in Scotland, and was paid a fee of £13, 6s. 8d.[4] The ballad by Dunbar shows how welcome the great commander, who had won his first laurels on the field of Bosworth, and gained before Bayard the title of "Chevalier sans reproche"[1] for his services in the Italian campaigns of Charles VIII. and Louis XII., was to the Scottish Court, and the elegy on his sudden death how deeply he was lamented. James had in fact requested that D'Aubigny should be sent, and when he came held tournaments in his honour, calling him the Father of War. He would probably have been employed, had he lived, in the war already threatening with England, and his influence might have controlled the rashness of James, and reversed the issue of Flodden. One other reference to him is to be found in these accounts (an allowance in 1510 of £5 to the Custumar of Ayr) for expenses incurred with reference to the provision "of Bernard Stewart, Lord Aubigny, when sent to St Ninians in respect of damage sustained by John Brownhill in the said provision."[2] Perhaps this somewhat obscure entry refers to the sending of D'Aubigny's heart, in accordance with the fulfilment of a vow to St Ninians.

After D'Aubigny's death the President of the Parliament of Paris and his suite were lodged in the Monastery of Newbattle, and a further sum of £63, 9s. 6d. was allowed for their board from 2nd July to 9th August.[3] It would appear from this comparatively small sum that the greater part of the suite had returned in consequence of his death, by which the negotiations for the renewal of the treaty was for a time frustrated.

It is now necessary to glance at the course of European politics during this period. On 10th December 1508 the League of Cambrai was concluded between Louis, Ferdinand of Aragon, and the Emperor Maximilian, and the Pope Julius II. joined it in March 1509. The object was to crush the Republic of Venice. The French invaded the Milanese, and by the victory of Agnadello, on 14th May 1509, became masters of Milan. Ferdinand seized the Neapolitan and southern ports; the Imperialists took Verona, Vicenza, Padua; the Pope occupied the cities of the Romagna.

Alarmed at the success of his French allies, Julius II. made terms with Venice, which submitted to all his demands, and declared his intention to drive the French, whom he called the barbarians, from Italy. In concert with the Venetians and the Swiss, he carried on the war vigorously, though not with uniform success, during the next two years. In October 1511 he succeeded in forming the Holy League, to which Venice, Ferdinand of Aragon, and Henry VIII. became parties. Louis XII., whom Henry VIII. tried to deceive by a friendly embassy under his favourite ambassador, West, "the crafty doctor," as Lesley styles him, in the summer of 1510, now found himself alone. He made a hazardous experiment—the summons of a General Council at Pisa in September 1511, as a counterblast to that already projected which was summoned to Rome for 19th April 1512 by Julius, but it was attended only by a few French cardinals. The French gained some brilliant victories under Gaston de Foix, culminating in that of Ravenna on 11th April 1512; but these victories had no permanent effect. The French Council had to retreat to Milan. The Pope's Council met on 3rd May 1512 in the Lateran. Before the close of the year the French forces were driven from Italy, and the Emperor had acceded to the Holy League. Julius II. had triumphed over all his enemies but one. Death put an end to his splendid Pontificate on 20th February 1513. His successor, Leo X., though more disposed to peace, was forced to continue the same policy, and the Holy League against France was renewed at Mechlin on 5th April 1513. The part played by Henry VIII. in the war had been at first ignominious. An English force under the Marquis of Dorset, sent to assist Ferdinand, mutinied at St Sebastian on 28th August 1512, and returned home without a blow. A naval exploit under Admiral Sir Edward Howard, on St Mark's Day 1513, when he attempted to seize the French galleys by a coup de main, was more brilliant than successful. The death of the admiral made it a doubtful victory. Meantime, both France and England were anxiously concerned as to what side James would take. His whole reign had been a training for war, and the affairs of Europe had reached a point which warned him he might soon have an opportunity for taking part in it on a greater scale. The years from 1508 to 1513, when peace had been established within the borders of Scotland, were largely occupied with active preparations. It is noteworthy that no Parliament met between 8th May 1509 and the brief meeting, so called, at Twiselhaugh on 24th August 1513. He had been otherwise occupied, and the Council, which met in May 1513, showed by its divided opinion what the English envoys had noted several years before, that a section of the Scottish nobles were not willing to fight with England. The Treasurer's accounts are missing from August 1508 to August 1511, and from 8th August 1513 to June 1515. Had they been extant they would have shown the large demands made on the country by the royal expenditure. The Controller's own account in this reign disappears after 1509. These blanks, scarcely accidental where so many accounts of less consequence have been preserved, suggest that those missing may have been destroyed, although it may be they have only been lost through the negligence of the custodians or the frequent changes in the place of their deposit. The same omissions prevent us from tracing the King's movements with the same minuteness as in the earlier part of his reign; but by the joint aid of the accounts in the present volume, and those in the Treasurer's Books, not yet published, a more exact view may be given than previous histories afford.

In the spring of 1508 James had made his usual visit to Whithern, returning to Edinburgh on the 28th of March. In April he had the series of interviews with the envoy of Henry VII., of which so curious an account has been preserved in the scroll despatch[1] already referred to. The envoy found him so busily engaged with making gunpowder that it was difficult to get an audience, but at last succeeded in seeing him on 2nd April and every day after till the 10th, soon after which the envoy left Edinburgh. The inconstancy of James was such that he hardly knew what account to send to Henry VII. After delivering his credence and enlarging on the favour Henry had shown James by including him in the Spanish alliance, for which James returned formal thanks, more serious matters were entered on. The envoy complained of the passage through England of "great personages from Scotland in disguise and without license," along with ambassadors of countries hostile to England. James prevented him from proceeding further, by producing the letter of 13th January he had received from Henry, and pointing out that its terms did not agree with the envoy's instructions. He also asked what great persons, except the Archbishop of St Andrews and the Earl of Arran, had passed through England, and what ambassadors except those of Gueldres. The envoy answered according to his instructions, but James, he reports, "lenyth so firmly to his own oppynion that in no wise can I satisfy him." All he could do was to transmit to Henry a copy of his own letters, to show "how lightly, in words of no importance, he stykyth." James next complained of the slaughter of Ker on a day of truce, and the failure to surrender Heron, the bastard. He agreed to a meeting between Lord Dacre and Lord Hume, but observed that the English warden had no power to give redress. All that the envoy could reply was, that the English had suffered four times as much as the Scots by these Border raids, at which he says, "Lord Hume was somewhat abashed; but the Scots Council generally were so proud headed that in nowise they will confess their error." The next point touched was the detention of Arran. The envoy offered that he might return on his oath and bond, to go back to England if called on. To this James replied, that if he gave such an oath he should be hung on his arrival in Scotland. James would neither ask himself, nor allow the French ambassador to ask, for Arran's release. With reference to the Gueldres ambassadors, James denied having brought them over under the safeguard of his servants, and said he had sent them back to Henry on their return, when Henry might have detained them if he pleased. The last point in diplomatic, as in other correspondence, was the really important one. It concerned the renewal of the French League. James declared that, if Henry acted the part of a loving father, he would not renew it. The whole body of Scotland, the King, Queen, and Bishop of Moray excepted, were, the envoy adds, in favour of its renewal; and no one was worse welcome than himself, as it was known, even "to the wives in the market," he had come to prevent it. A personal meeting between the kings was alluded to, and James said he would gladly meet Henry, but his honour prevented him doing so at any place except on the Borders. So this bootless embassy came to an end. Wolsey, if Wolsey it was, had not discovered the real mind of James or of the Bishop of Moray.

The Exchequer Rolls do not refer to this embassy, but as it certainly came, their negative evidence is unimportant. Still it is singular, if Wolsey was the envoy, that no trace of his visit to Scotland should be found either in the English or Scottish Records, and that the fact must at present rest solely on a single scroll and unsigned despatch. The style of this despatch, and the view of the character of James, does not differ from the tone of the subsequent despatches in the spring of 1513, of which West was undoubtedly the writer. Yet it may be argued that it was not likely an envoy should be sent back to Scotland who had been so unfavourably received four years before. The question whether Wolsey ever visited Scotland and met James IV., important as it undoubtedly is, must be deemed an unsettled point.

No sooner had the English envoy left than D'Aubigny came, and the period from 12th May to 11th June 1508 was spent by James in his company in or near Edinburgh. On 2nd May he was at Falkland, but the reception of the French ambassador, D'Aubigny, and Sellat, the President of the Parliament of Paris, probably took place at Edinburgh, where tournaments were held in their honour, too soon followed by the death of D'Aubigny on the 8th or 11th of June.[1] On 30th June James visited the Isle of May from Pittenweem, gave fourteen shillings in alms to the Hermit and sixteen pence to the rowers of a boat which took him round the island to "schoot at fowlis with the culverin;" and on 1st July sailed to Pittenweem, Kinghorn, Inchcolme, landing on the following day[2] at Leith, where he went to Robert Barton's house. There can be little doubt these days were spent in consultation on the defences of the Firth of Forth, and in arrangements for the building of new ships. The request of the King of Denmark[3] for naval aid against the Hanseatic League would also be con-

It is uncertain whether the true date of D'Aubigny's death was the 8th of June as the date of the Inventory seems to show, or the 11th, as given in the Rolls, p. 123.

sidered. On 27th June the Queen gave birth to a girl, who died soon after her christening. On 4th July James rode to Stirling[1] by way of Kinneil, and from Stirling on a hunting expedition to Glenartney.[2] On 3rd August he had returned again to Edinburgh, and probably was present when the Exchequer audit for that year was concluded on the following day.[3] In September he was still in Edinburgh.[4] In the beginning of December he went for the Circuit to Jedburgh and Melrose,[5] but returned, it is likely, to Falkland, and kept Christmas at St Andrews.[6]

During the next two years it is more difficult to follow his movements.

The Court remained at St Andrews till 17th January 1509, and then returned to Edinburgh, where it remained till the Easter Ayres. On 9th February[7] he was again at St Andrews. On the 8th of the following month he attended the Parliament at Edinburgh.[8] He appears to have visited Darnaway and Inverness[9] in the course of the year, and made a pilgrimage to St Duthacs at Tain from Inverness.[10] Returning south in the end of July, he, or at least his household, went to Falkland,[11] and on 11th September to Edinburgh,[12] while James was on a pilgrimage to St Duthacs. On 20th

October a prince, christened Arthur of Scotland, was born at Edinburgh, but James no doubt returned for the baptism, and on 8th December he was at Stirling.[1]

For the year 1510 the notices of his movements are still more meagre.[2] He was at Stirling on 14th January,[3] and from 10th to 13th March.[4] After Easter, along with the Queen he rode by way of Elgin to St Duthacs.[5] On 13th July Prince Arthur died at Edinburgh, and the King and Queen went to Stirling after the funeral. On the 8th of November he went from Edinburgh to the Ayre of Jedburgh,[6] "well accompanied." At Jedburgh he "justified divers broken men," and sent others to ward, "whereat the Borders were in greater quietness thereafter."

During 1511 he was chiefly occupied with the building of the great St Michael, which probably prevented him from accompanying the Queen in her visit to Aberdeen on 10th May. While in or near Edinburgh, in the beginning of August,[7] he heard of Andrew Barton's death.

During this and the following month he resided in Edinburgh, paying frequent visits to his new docks at Newhaven,[8] where shipbuilding went on busily. In the end of September he appears to have gone to Stirling, where he remained till about the middle of October, but still continued his visits to Newhaven.[1]

On the 14th of October he was again at Edinburgh, where he remained for the rest of that month.[2] On the 28th he paid a visit to Leith. On the 10th of November he was again at Stirling, probably on his way to a pilgrimage to St Duthacs, for we find him on 8th December at Darnaway.[3] Before Christmas he had returned to Edinburgh, where he spent that festival.[4]

During the winter and spring of 1512 he appears to have remained at Edinburgh. In February Octavian Olarius, whose name appears in the Rolls,[5] an envoy of the Pope, came to Edinburgh with letters from the Pope and Cardinals,[6] urgently exhorting him to aid in maintaining peace in Europe. Octavian returned to Rome before 1st July with a reply from James, in which he warmly responded to the Pope's desire for peace, but pointed out that the real disturber of the peace was the King of England, who had taken, imprisoned, and slain Scottish subjects, paying no heed to James's remonstrances, and at the same time carrying on war against the most Christian King. He concludes by exhorting Julius to remember the services of France to the Holy See, and to dissuade Henry VIII. from further hostilities, so that both kings might take part, under Julius's leadership, in the campaign against the Infidels.

On 1st July Julius wrote again to James, thanking him for his devotion to the Holy See, and his zeal against the Infidels, but informing him that the French were still shedding Christians' blood in Italy,[1] which prevented the Crusade he had at heart, and urging James to prevent the French king from continuing the Italian war. He closes his letter by congratulating James on the birth of an heir.[2]

Octavian was probably the bearer of this letter, for he returned at Christmas, and remained in Scotland till February 1513.[3]

The building of the great ship, the "St Michael," which took a year to build, was carried on under the superintendence of Sir Andrew Wood, and it occupied much of the King's thoughts and time. He was constantly at Newhaven in January, February, and March 1512. The affairs of the west appear to have again demanded his attention, and on 24th March he was at Dumbarton, a port which had at this time frequent communication with France, to avoid the danger of sailing near the English coast.[1]

On 10th April, the eve of Easter, Margaret bore a prince, afterwards James v., who was christened on Easter-day at Linlithgow, when his father was present. On 22nd April he was at Edinburgh. He was at Ayr on the 29th of April and on the 8th of May. But Linlithgow was his headquarters from April to June, and these were merely excursions from it. At least he was at Linlithgow on 5th April, and again on sundry occasions in May, and apparently down to 2nd June, when he came to Edinburgh.[2] While at Linlithgow, as at Edinburgh, he was frequently going to Newhaven to inspect the outfit of the "St Michael."[3] For the rest of the year, so far as his movements can be traced, he was in Edinburgh ;[4] but as we find him at Queensferry on 21st June, and again on 4th August, it is not improbable he spent the summer months at Falkland, returning to Edinburgh or Linlithgow in autumn. He was in Edinburgh on 12th November.[5]

In May De La Motte, the French ambassador, had come with letters full of promises from Louis XII. if James would aid him against England, and he returned to France in July "with a good answer." He carried with him the Treaty whose preliminaries had been adjusted on 6th March, and which was signed on 12th July. His expenses at Dumbarton, the port from which he sailed, appear in the accounts of that burgh.[1] On 29th November he came again to Scotland, urging James to declare war against England. A storm drove his vessel from Leith Roads to Blackness, near which James received him on board the "St Michael."[2] He brought the ratification of the treaty, signed by Louis, and a great ship full of artillery, powder, and wine. On 15th December 1512 James made his last pilgrimage to Whithern.

In 1513 the preparations for war went on with increased vigour. On 15th January James issued letters to the Sheriffs and burghs south of the Forth ordering wapinschawings. During the whole of this month and February he was at Holyrood, and went daily to the Castle to superintend the making of guns, and to Newhaven to inspect the progress of his ships. One of the new guns burst at the Castle, and James narrowly escaped the fate of his grandfather. On 14th February De La Motte sailed from the Forth, along with Octavian Olarius, Jacques Tarret, who had been employed in the building of the great ship, now completed, and sixty Scots.[3]

[2] Lord Dacre's Letter to Henry, 10th December 1512. Pinkerton, vol. ii. p. 80.

[3] It is somewhat strange that so many Scots were sent to France at this juncture, but Tarret was to engage mariners, probably men skilled in the use of artillery, for the great ship.

James spent an hour on board his ship to bid the ambassador farewell.[1] About the same time he erected a tower on Inchgarvy—of which some vestiges still remain—to defend the passage of Queensferry. In March he went to Stirling. West, who had been sent by Henry VIII. as much as a spy as an envoy, having arrived in Edinburgh on 16th March, followed the King there. He found James had made a retreat to the convent of the Friars Observant, and was invisible for business. West dined on 27th March with the Queen, who complained of the detention of her jewels. These, West said, would be delivered if the King would promise to keep the treaty with England; if not, his best towns would be taken. Before he had finished this awkward sentence James came in and interrupted the conversation. "After some communication," for "a pastime had," reports West, James went off to the sermon. Next day West and Sir John Ramsay, the Scottish traitor, came to Court, and James being at church, sent for him to his travis (or latticed seat), and showed him the briefs issued by the new Pope, Leo X., and a bull of excommunication, observed that it was all Wolsey's doing, though on the suggestion of Henry and his Council, and declared he would send the Bishop of Moray to Rome to expostulate, and that he would appeal from the Pope. West said it was the Pope's own motion, that no excommunication was issued unless he broke the peace, and asked to whom could he appeal. To this James answered, laughing, "To Prester John." On the 30th, West, without waiting to be sent for, came to Court, and had another interview with James in the chapel. The King showed him "a little quire of four sheets," containing Louis XII.'s promises, especially those relating to the aid he was to receive for his voyage to the Holy Land as soon as peace was made. West said these were empty promises, and pressed for an answer in writing to his master that James would keep peace with England. This James refused, as it might be shown in France, and lose him 'the French King;' but after a little offered, if West would put his demands in writing, that he should have a written answer. Next day he could get no audience. On 1st April he was admitted to a meeting with the King in Council, where James gave him a similar answer; but after the Council withdrew, according to West, James privately offered to give up the French alliance if Henry would make him the same promises the French King had done. "Whether there was craft in this demeanour and answer" West leaves to Henry and his Council.[1] There was no craft except the time-worn devices of diplomatic fencing on both sides. On the 9th of April, James was in Edinburgh, and West, following him there, got after some delay the promised letter. Instead of any proposal for peace, he found in it a recapitulation of the wrongs Scotland had suffered at the hands of the English. He seems to have left Edinburgh on 13th April, but went to Linlithgow to take leave of the Queen on Sunday the 10th, then returned to Edinburgh, and left it finally on Wednesday the 13th.[1] Before he left he took occasion to go to Leith and Newhaven, where he saw the ships James was preparing. He disparages their number and size; but James, who probably suggested his visit to Leith, had boasted of them, especially of the great "St Michael," which, he said, had "more cannon than the French ever brought to a siege." This West regarded as "a crack." It was not likely that the Scots King would give up the vessel, whatever her size, to Henry, which was one of the bold demands his envoy had made. The letters which West took with him informed Henry that the Bishop of Moray had gone direct to Rome as a safe conduct through England was refused, and urged him to make peace with France. Margaret wrote from Linlithgow an ironically indignant letter about her jewels. She did not now care for them, as her husband, who was ever "the longer the better" to her, would make up for their loss.

[1] West's Dispatch, 13th April 1513. Papers of Henry VIII., p. 532, describes his movements in much greater detail than is here possible.

Within less than a month of West's departure De la Motte returned from France, and was received by James and his Council at Edinburgh about the middle of May.[1] He brought four ships with supplies, some English vessels taken on the way, letters from Louis, and a letter with a turquoise ring from Anne of Brittany, in which she appealed to James to act as her knight. Though there was some discussion in the Scottish Council, the aged Elphinstone Angus Bell-the-Cat and the smaller but better part of the nobles being opposed to war, the opinion of the King, and the majority prevailed. War was decided on. A letter of 24th May—once more, for the last time, urging Henry to enter into a truce, which Ferdinand of Aragon had concluded for a year, and condoling with him for the loss of Howard, the Admiral, in an engagement with the French—could scarcely be deemed serious on either side. The English Parliament had also decided on war, and Henry, before sailing on 30th June for France, sent Surrey to defend the Borders.

Before the end of May James was at Linlithgow, and there the strange apparition of the bearded man, with blue coat and white linen girdle, brotikins on his feet and a staff in his hand, dissuading him from war and exhorting him to 'mell with no woman,' was seen in the Church, not only by the King but also by his suite, one of whom, Sir David Lyndsay the poet, reported it to Buchanan. It was probably a device of the party averse to war. But James was not to be turned from his purpose. Superstitious fear had as little effect as diplomatic cunning. The great O'Donnel, a chief of Ulster, came from Ireland on 1st June and offered his services for the English war, but there is no evidence that any Irish troops actually came to Scotland. On 20th June letters were despatched to the Westland, Galloway, Stirling, Clydesdale, Lothian, Merse, and Teviotdale, for furnishing the ships with provisions. On 24th July letters were issued to Fife, Angus, Bute, Argyll, and other shires, and also to the West and Southland ordering a muster at Ellem.[1] On 25th July James commissioned his fleet from Leith for France, under the command of the Earl of Arran and Lord Huntly, and accompanied it himself as far as the Isle of May; and next day sent Lyon King of Arms to Henry, now before Terrouenne, to declare war, with a letter rehearsing, one by one, the injuries Scotland had sustained. Lyon arrived at Henry's camp on 11th August, and received a defiant reply on the 12th. "As you do to us and our realm," it concluded, "so it shall be remembered and acquitted hereafter, by the help of our Lord and our Patron St George." James had certainly not kept the promise which, if West can be credited, he made—to give the English King time to return to defend his borders; but no reference is made to it in Henry's letter, nor does it seem quite consistent with such a promise that Surrey had been sent to defend the Border before Henry left England. Lord Hume, the Chamberlain, immediately after struck the first blow by a raid, called the Ill Raid, on the east Border, and was surprised on his return by Sir W. Bulmer at Millfield. On 8th August James made a hasty pilgrimage to St Duthacs, to propitiate his favourite saint. On his return he may probably have stopped at Linlithgow, to bid farewell to the Queen. On the 20th of August he appears to have been in Edinburgh, for the witnessing clause of a charter of that date confirming the mortification of a tenement in Edinburgh by Walter Chepman, the merchant printer to the Church of St Giles, contains several names of those who were present and of some who fell at Flodden. Before going to St Duthacs he had summoned his whole feudal array to meet within twenty days upon the Borough Muir of Edinburgh. Some day between the 13th and the 20th of August probably was the day of the rendezvous, for the feudal array was called out on twenty days' notice for forty days' service. There were more than 60,000, according to one account; 100,000 men, according to another. In any view, the largest army ever collected in Scotland mustered round his standard, which was set in the Borestone, still preserved on the road to Morningside. The invasion of England began on 22nd August with the siege of Norham. The short three weeks' campaign, which ended in Flodden, falls beyond the period of this volume, whose latest entry is the Account of the Baillie of Crail to 6th August 1513.

Lyndsay of Pitscottie describes the Household of James v.[1] as consisting of the "Treasurer, Comptroller, Secretary, Mr. Macer,[2] Mr. Household, Cupper (Cupbearer), Carver, Mr. Stabler, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Falconer, Mr. Porter, and a Fool, called Mr. Mackalrie." But the Exchequer Accounts furnish a much fuller and more accurate list of the royal household of James IV. The King and Queen had separate households and household books (Libri Domicilii) at least as early as 1508, when there is a list of the Queen's Household in the account of Duncan Forrestar,[3] styled her Provisor or Purveyor. Her Household Books are mentioned in 1506 and 1507.[4] Probably the separation existed from the date of her marriage, as was usual in feudal courts, owing to the frequent absence of the King. The list of the King's household in 1508, with their wages, is given in the Controller's Account for that year.[5] The Earl of Argyll held the apparently honorary office of Master of the Household.[1] Andrew, Lord Avondale, was the First Door-keeper or Usher (Hostiarius), with a fee of 20 marks. The other members of the household are classed according to their fees. Two Keepers of the Outer Chamber, the Butler, Wardroper, Carver, and seven Marshalls each received 20 marks, or £13, 6s. 8d. The Keeper of the Wine-Cellar, two Stewards, a Clerk of Accounts, a Butcher, a Furrier (Fodderator), a Tailor, a Keeper of Spices, a Barber, and a Gate-keeper, had each £10. Nineteen minor servants, amongst whom may be noted a Tawyer[2] (Allutarius) and an Armourer (Hernezarius), received 6 marks; seven others, 5 marks; twenty-four others, 4 marks. Thomas Shaw, the chief Cook, had a fee of £10, besides other allowances and perquisites. Five Servers or Kitchen-boys had two marks, and five Turnspits (Turnbrochis) had one mark for their winter clothing. The Keeper of the Silver Plate had £20,[3] and the Keeper of the Tin Vessels, £6, 13s. 8d.

Besides these, there were the Heralds and Pursuivants and the Officers of the Guard, Sir John Foreman, the First Porter[4] (Janitor), and Robert the Cutler, who had each £20. A Cross-Bowman had £5, 6s. 8d., and four Esquires 20 marks a piece. It was first recognised in the next reign that a Scottish King required a Body-Guard like that of the French Monarch. The smallness of the Guard in this and prior reigns is noteworthy, and explains how easily the Scottish King was kidnapped. Michael Balfour, junior, in the Buttery, probably a son of Sir Michael Balfour of Burleigh, the Queen's Carver, seems to have been specially favoured, and had a fee of £10, which included the wages of his servant. An allowance of 35 shillings apiece for foddering the horses of 37 of the King's household indicates their ambulatory duties and the frequent movements of the King, whose servants, down to cooks, had to be provided with horses. Riding was the necessary mode of transit, for there were few roads fit for carriages, and no coachmen or drivers appear in the royal household. Sir Walter Forrester had £20 a year for keeping the Torwood and mowing its hay, the chief supply of the royal stud. The total number of the King's household, according to this account, without reckoning the Guard, was 82, and their pay £478, 13s. 4d. In 1497 the pay of the royal household is nearly the same, £475, 6s. 8d.[1] The household of Henry Percy, fifth Earl of Northumberland, in 1512, of which a contemporary account has been preserved,[1] consisted of 156 servants, and cost £1000 a year; this included the servants of "My Lady, My young Lord, and his Brother," as well as the ecclesiastical establishment of the Earl's chapel. But these differences, and the existence of other officials of the Royal Household not included in the present Accounts, make it impossible to draw an exact comparison between the two Households.

Substantially the same account was rendered in 1509 by Sir Duncan Forrestar, the Comptroller, without mentioning that the payments were made through the Treasurer.[2]

The Queen's household in 1508, of which Duncan Forestar is styled "Magnus Provisor," consisted of a Carver, Doorkeepers of the inner and outer door, Butler, Steward, Keeper of the Linen (napery), who had fees varying from £20 to £13, 6s. 8d., and several servants who received 6 marks, eleven at 4 marks, besides the kitchen servants, including two Cooks, two Grooms of the Kitchen, and two Turnspits.[3] Eighteen of her servants had an allowance of 35 shillings for their horses' keep. Their total number was 42, and their wages £167, 6s. 8d. John Leslie and a groom of the name of Lyndsay, who had attended on the young deceased Prince James, also continued to be paid. In 1509 Duncan Forrestar, who had been knighted, succeeded Thomas Redheuch as Controller, so there is no separate account rendered by him as the Queen's Provisor; but the same payments to the servants are continued, and included in his account as Controller.[1] In neither account are the women servants of the Queen mentioned, and they must have been paid separately, probably by Queen Margaret herself out of her marriage provision. This had been fixed by the treaty of marriage at £2000 a year, and it was stipulated that twenty-four of her servants should be English.[2] By a subsequent letter of 12th July 1503,[3] James promised to pay suitable fees to these English attendants; and their payment appears in the Treasurer's Accounts. One of the Queen's English servants, Margaret Dennate or Tennant, is mentioned in these Accounts, but she had retired from service and become the wife of Sir Alexander Ogilvy, receiving a grant for life of the farms of Cullaird and other lands in Strathearn.[4]

The names of one or two of the royal servants deserve a word of comment.

Sir John Forman of Rutherfurd, brother of the Bishop of Moray, who identified James's body at Flodden, appears throughout the Accounts as First Porter[5] (Janitor). James Dog, whose name appears as a Groom of the Wardrobe of the King in 1508[1] and 1509,[2] is the officer so frequently referred to in Dunbar's poems.[3] The favour in which he was held is shown by his holding the office of Chamberlain of Menteith[4] from May 1508 to the close of the reign, and a lease of Easter and Middle Coldheuch,[5] along with his wife Agnes, and the fee of a portion of Cessintuly,[6] both in Menteith. On 12th May 1500 he bought the estate of Duntober in Perthshire.[7] On 3rd October 1491 he had acquired the lands of Auchenbannow in Menteith on the resignation of his brother Alexander, a Canon of Inchmahome.[8] The wardrobe was an important department of the royal household at a time when many payments were made by the delivery of clothes (hence called livery) instead of money to the officials and dependents of the Court.[9] Its keeper, like the royal tailor, had probably the best chances of growing rich. Dog had been in the King's service since 1489, as appears from the Treasurers' Accounts; and there are frequent references to him down to 1526, when he probably died. He is not specially called Keeper of the Queen's Wardrobe, the character in which Dunbar addresses one of his poems to him; but on 24th September 1523 Surrey mentions him as the Queen of Scots servant. Possibly the Queen had the use of some of the King's servants. The wardrobe, unlike some others, would be a stationary office. His son, James Dog the younger, was also in the royal wardrobe in 1524.[1]

Amongst the Queen's servants in 1508 is "unus vocatus Lyndesay in averia quondam domini principis," who received, by the King's command, a fee of £4, 8s. 4d.[2] May this be the first appearance of Sir David Lyndsay, the future Lyon King? If so, it is an earlier notice than has hitherto been discovered of him. Mr David Laing's researches only traced him back to 1511, when he received a payment for a coat of blue and yellow taffeta, which is entered in the Treasurer's Accounts. It favours this conjecture that he is here referred to as holding a similar position as Groom of the Stable (averia) of the first Prince James to that of Groom of the Chamber, which he is known to have afterwards held in attendance on the person of his brother, James v.

John Inglis, Marshal of the King's Household, whom Buchanan cites as another eye-witness of the apparition at Linlithgow along with Lyndsay, also appears in these accounts.[3]

Robert Spittal, who appears in the accounts as the Queen's tailor, with a fee of £10,[4] is the well-known founder of the Hospital at Stirling, whose inscription-stone may still be seen on a house in Broad Street with a pair of shears, the emblem of his craft, and the inscription, "This hous is fundit for support of ye puir be Robert Spittal, talzour to James ye 4th, anno 1530, N.S." The rich dresses of the men as well as the women of the period, made the Court tailor's office more lucrative than in the present day, even if Spittal did not, like George Heriot, combine with his proper business that of a money-lender. In the hall of the Hospital is the quaint tablet, which, after recording Spittal's donation of the ground on which it stands, proceeds :—"He likewise gave part of his wealth for building useful bridges in this neighbourhood. Forget not, reader, that the scissors of this man do more honour to human nature than the swords of conquerors."

Master Laurence Taillyfer, whose name does not occur in the list of the royal household, but in the Edinburgh account of 1511, when he receives £10 for his labours and his fee,[1] was no doubt the "honest and learned man, one of the King's servants, and a spectator of the fight of Flodden," whose report, more than once told to George Buchanan, was "that he saw the King when the day was lost set upon a horse and cross the Tweed."[2] But in estimating the value of such a report, we must remember the confusion that occurs when a battle has been lost, and the fact that James had caused others to be dressed in the same livery he wore himself.

The nurses of the royal children were always highly rewarded, generally by grants of annuities from land; and there are examples of this in the present accounts in the case of Mariot Spens, the nurse of the Earl of Mar, the King's brother, who received a fee of £10 a year;[1] of Isobel Elphinston, nurse of the first Prince James, who had £20 from the lands of Chapelton;[2] of the wife of David Carruthers, nurse of Prince Arthur, who had £3 and 8 bolls barley;[3] and of the wife of Alexander Scott, nurse of the future James v., who had £10 from the customs of the King's goods,[4] which, however, there were insufficient funds to pay.

The accounts in the present Rolls, aided by notices elsewhere, enable us to fix the dates of the births and deaths of the children of James and Margaret Tudor. Her early marriage and delicate health had a fatal effect on her offspring. The first child of the marriage was born on 21st February 1507. Its birth had been anticipated on the day before in a quaint resolution of the Edinburgh Town Council.[5]

It was christened two days after at the Abbey of Holyrood under the name of James, Prince of Scotland and the Isles.[1] The hopes of the nation were disappointed by his early death at Stirling on 17th February 1508, a date confirmed by the reference to the nurse of the "late first-born son of our Lord the King," in an account audited in July of that year.[2] On 15th July 1508 a daughter was born, who died soon after baptism.[3] On 20th October 1509 another son was born, who was christened Prince Arthur of Scotland[4] and the Isles.[5] In the account of Strathdon for the period from 16th July 1509 to 22nd August 1510 there is a memorandum that Alexander, Lord Elphinston, was made a Lord of Parliament at the time of the baptism[6] of Prince Arthur, and received a grant of the lands of Kildrummy, by a Charter of 14th January 1510,[7] in favour of himself and his wife Elizabeth in conjunct fee. This boy, whom James looked forward to as an Arthur of Scotland who might recall the Arthur of Britain, died on 13th July 1510.[8] On 11th April, Easter eve, 1512, James, the future King, was born at Linlithgow, and he was christened, like his brother, Prince of Scotland and the Isles.[9] In November of the same year a daughter was born, who died soon after her baptism.[10]

Finally, on 13th April 1514 the posthumous child Alexander, created Duke of Rothesay, was born in Stirling Castle, and died on 18th December 1515.[1]

Of six children only one survived infancy, and the direct succession to the Scottish Crown was perilled on a single infant's life. The effect of this was seen in the succeeding reign, which verified the proverb Sir David Lyndsay quotes, that the nation is unhappy whose sovereign is a child.

An account of the King's bastards has been given in the Preface to the last volume, but Alexander Stewart, Archbishop of St Andrews, deserves further notice in connection with the period embraced in the present volume. It was pointed out by Mr Burnett that he is proved to have been made Archbishop before July 1505 by the Stirlingshire account of 23rd July in that year.[1] This conclusion is confirmed by the letter of James IV. to Julius II., which, though undated, appears rightly placed by Mr Gairdner in that year.[2] In this letter[3] he thanks the Pope for making the appointment, and proposes that a Friar preacher, whose name is left blank, should administer the diocese during the minority of Alexander. The expression in it that the See had been conferred upon him "vel impubescens," though under the age of puberty, proves his birth was not earlier than 1493, probably in that year, which tallies with the statement of Erasmus, that he was about twenty when he fell at Flodden. As he is shown by the same Stirlingshire account to have been in Stirling at some period between 20th July 1504 and 23rd July 1505, he cannot have gone to the Continent prior to that period. It was probably in 1505 or the following year that he was sent abroad under the care of Sir James Halkerston, and, after making the tour of the Low Countries and of France, settled in Padua to enjoy the tuition of Erasmus.

Several letters between the young Archbishop, his father, and Patrick Panther, his first tutor, have been preserved, which prove he was in Padua in 1508, and probably in 1509. James declined a proposal that he should visit Rome, on the ground that he was still too young and uneducated. The Archbishop's singular epistles reveal an independent and wilful character, different from the fancy portrait drawn of him by his panegyrists and adopted by Dean Stanley, who called him the "young Marcellus of the Scottish Church." Writing to his father from Padua on 28th March 1508, he mentions that many of his letters had either miscarried or been unanswered, so he had even thought it would be useless to send more; but he felt bound to thank the King for appointing his tutor, Halkerston, Archdeacon of

[1] Letters of Richard III. and Henry VII., vol. i., p. 267.

Aberdeen.[1] In a letter to Panther, two days later, he refers to certain false reports about himself which had reached the King's ears, and thanks Panther for contradicting them. To his father, on 22nd October, he again complains of the miscarriage of his letters and the opposition to his tutor's appointment to the Archdeaconry by Bishop Elphinstone, who had raised a suit on the subject in Rome, and requested that another benefice might be given his tutor, if possible in his own diocese of St Andrews, and the benefices then held by him conferred on his dependants. He concludes by complaining bitterly that the minor benefices of St Andrews were given to the dependants of others, while his own got no good livings.[1] Towards the end of the year Panther again wrote, describing his exertions on his behalf to retain the Priory of Restennet for the See of St Andrews, to restrain the privileges of the Chapel Royal,[2] and to procure his own appointment, as successor to his brother James, in the Abbey of Dunfermline, or to give the Archbishop himself that rich benefice in Commendam. It was with great difficulty, he says, that he got James to sign the necessary documents. In a later letter he congratulated the Archbishop that Restennet has been restored to St Andrews, and the Abbey of Dunfermline "now knows its new master." . . . . "St Andrews has repelled the darts of its adversaries, and turned some of them on the bodies of its opponents." . . . . "The sly fish has been caught on the hook." The competition for ecclesiastical offices was carried on then with the same unblushing effrontery as that for political and judicial offices has sometimes been in later times. In 1509, when James was at Edinburgh, the Archbishop returned by way of Flanders, accompanied by the Laird of Fast-Castle, who had been at Cairo in the service of the Turk.

Before 2nd August 1510, and not in 1511, as Crawford,[1] or 1512, as Spottiswoode[2] states, Alexander Stewart was nominated Chancellor, and the youth of seventeen appears as "the Most Reverend Father in Christ, Alexander, Archbishop of St Andrews, Chancellor of Scotland,"[3] in the commission of 1510 issued to the Auditors of Exchequer. He was again Auditor in 1512.[4] The only other references to him in these accounts are the payments of the Cane of Cupar, part of the revenues of the See.[5] As became a pupil of Erasmus, Alexander Stewart was a patron of learning. He augmented in 1512 the stipends of the Professors of the Pædagogium, the foundation of Bishop Wardlaw (afterwards called St Mary's), and gave them the fruits of the Church of St Michael of Tarvit, near Cupar. He also rebuilt the Chapel of St John the Evangelist.[6]

In the next year, along with Prior John Hepburn, he founded the College of St Leonard's, endowing it with the tithes of that parish and of the hospice for pilgrims who came to visit the relics of St Andrew. The three foundation charters still exist in the Register of St Andrews. By one, dated 21st August 1512, "within our Palace of St Andrews," the Archbishop converts the Hospice and Church of St Leonard's into a College; by the second dated 1st February 1503, the Friar and Canons endow it with lands; and in the third, of 23rd Feb. 1513, James IV. confirms the two former charters.

He accompanied his father on the campaign of Flodden. According to a tradition Pitscottie embodied in his Chronicle, and Buchanan accepted, the Archbishop spent in an intrigue with the daughter of Lady Ford the precious days James was wasting with her mother, who betrayed his plans to Surrey. The English contemporary satirist also refers to the intrigue in the lines—

> "Ye had better to have busked to Huntly Bankis
> Than in Englonde to play ony such prankis." [1]

It is impossible to feel quite certain of the truth of these scandalous stories. But it is not inconsistent with the character of James or with the license the manners of the time allowed an archbishop. The often-quoted panegyric of Erasmus on his talents and scholarship can scarcely count on this point in his favour, for the moral standard of the humanist scholars, suddenly brought in contact with the licentious writers of heathen antiquity, was often not superior to that of the dignified Churchmen. With more plausibility it has been pleaded that the time was short, as well as singularly inopportune, for a love-intrigue; that James destroyed Ford as well as the other English castles, and that its mistress was scarcely likely to have yielded her honour, and played the part of Delilah to her country's enemy. It may have been an invention to account for the discomfiture which afterwards befell the Scots. In the present state of the evidence it is not possible to pronounce a decided verdict. In the fatal battle Alexander fell by his father's side. His weak sight can scarcely have allowed him to be an active combatant. A skeleton with a deep sword-cut on the skull, found in a stone coffin in the Cathedral, has been supposed to be that of the Archbishop; but it is little likely that any corpses were brought home from Flodden. Alexander Stewart appears to have been a promising scholar. On this point it is impossible to reject Erasmus' testimony, but he was ambitious, with the subtle and dangerous form of a Churchman's ambition for his Church and his friends rather than himself, which wears the guise of virtue. That he would have adorned, much more that he would have reformed the Scottish Church is mere speculation. His character, like that of his father, has been leniently judged owing to his sad and early death.

The royal Palaces during this period continue to be Stirling, Linlithgow, Falkland, and Holyrood. Stirling was a frequent resort of James, owing to its neighbourhood to the hunting forest of Glenartney, and the presence in it of a convent of Friars Observant, amongst whom he was enrolled as a lay brother, and to which he frequently came for the Lenten fast, as well as the Chapel Royal, in whose musical services he, like his father, took much interest. Alexander Elphinstone was keeper of the Castle[1] from Whitsunday 1508, when Andrew Aiton was relieved of the office, and received a fee of £80 a year.[1] In 1511 Sir Robert Calendar was Constable, and as such had charge of the works,[2] and also of the ships at the Pows[3] of Airth. Prior to 1498 Sir Thomas Smith, the Abbot of Lindores, and Sir W. Betoune, along with Andrew Aiton, had been successively Master of Works. The new works had been begun about 8th June 1496, and probably before the period of the present account the King's house, for which Walter and John Merlioun[4] had contracted as masons, had been completed. From its earlier style the Great Hall is ascribed to James III. and his favourite, Cochrane. There are no entries in the present accounts for payments to masons. The "five wawis of iron"[1] for clamping, as well as the glass for the windows, now beginning to be used in all the palaces, and for providing which Thomas Peebles received a fee of 20 marks annually, would be the finishing touches after the completion of the edifice. The fees to the porters and watchmen, "eight by night, and one by day,"[2] are proof that the fear of attack was still present. The "Great Garden" and the "Garden under the Wall" continued to be kept up, as the regular fees to the gardener show,[3] and a new park had been formed for the beasts,[4] probably deer, boars, and the wild cattle which may still be seen in the parks of Cadzow and Chillingham, favourite pets of James IV., as of other kings. It was in the Great Garden that the Round Table, or elevated plot of ground, sometimes called the King's Knot, had been laid out, of which the outlines may still be seen. Barbour refers to it, but the revival of the Arthurian romance by James IV. gave it a new significance in the chivalric and poetic traditions of Scotland, which Lyndsay celebrates in the lines—

> "Adew, fair Snowdoun, with thy towers hie, > Thy Chapel Royal, Park and Table Round."

The inner court of the Palace had a kennel called the Lions' Den,[5] from the lions kept there, like the wolves at Rome and the bears at Berne, as living representatives of heraldic symbols. The ecclesiastics at Stirling, as elsewhere—and probably more than elsewhere—came in for a large share of royal benefactions. One Chaplain was maintained in the Collegiate Church or Chapel Royal, originally the Church of St Michael, and another in the Old Church within the Castle, which had been built as early as David I.'s reign, two in the Parish Church of St Ninian's,[1] and a fifth at its altar of St Laurence.[2] The lands of Strathbran were mortified in favour of the Chapel Royal,[3] and the annual rent of Craigorth (Craigforth), paid to its Chaplain. In 1508 the Old Church within the Castle was rebuilt, the number of Chaplains in it raised to three,[4] and a fee granted to the Chaplain of St Roche at the south end of the bridge.[5] The Abbots of Cambuskenneth[6] and Culross[7] received annual payments in conformity with old grants. The Friars Observant were the frequent objects of the King's alms,[8] and, in spite of Dunbar's perhaps satirical reflections on their fare, seem to have brewed good ale, for which they were provided with malt.

Linlithgow, a convenient half-way house between Edinburgh and Stirling, was in the earlier part of his reign as common a residence of James as Stirling. The shire, like Stirlingshire, was royal property. The site of the knoll overlooking its then pure loch was beautiful, and the Palace, commenced after the fire of 1424 had wrecked the earlier buildings, had been carried on by the first three Jameses and by James IV. down to 1496, as has been traced in the Treasurers' Accounts.[1] It seems at that date to have been completed, though a single payment has been noted in the Exchequer Rolls of 1503.[2] During the period covered by the present volume the only accounts are for the repair of its roof,[3] and the glass in its windows.[4] Great attention seems to have been given to its garden. Gilbert, the gardener, had a fee of 8 marks, and was bound to supply onions and mustard to the Court,[5] and in 1513 he received an extra payment of £6, 14s.[6] Sir Alexander M^cCulloch of Myreton, its keeper, had a fee of £10.[7] The herbage of its meadows was assigned to the King's horses.[8] This Palace, which Sir David Lyndsay vaunts as "ane patron (pattern) in Portugall or France," had, it has been well remarked, "more of the character of a mansion" than the older royal Castles of Stirling and Edinburgh.[9]

During the first years of his reign James frequently spent Christmas[10] and Easter[11] at Linlithgow, but in the period covered by these accounts he seems to have preferred to keep the great festivals at Edinburgh, St Andrews, or Stirling.

It was in Linlithgow that Margaret Tudor's only child who survived infancy was born, and Margaret spent most of the remainder of her married life there.

The shire was part of her dowry, and the Palace would have been one of her dower houses had she not rushed into her imprudent second marriage with the young Earl of Angus. From its north-west tower, which is still called Margaret's Bower, probably her oratory, she watched James as he rode to the Borough Muir, and, tradition says, kept vigil, watching for his return.

Falkland was the summer Palace of James IV., where he spent the time he could spare from the cares of business and duties of religion. He has been credited with some of the buildings of the palace. The last entries in the Exchequer Rolls[1] which refer to this in 1506 and 1507 are an account for slating the new chapel in 1512, an account of £200[2] paid in the same year to William Thome, mason, which may probably refer to the same work,[3] and another for the roof of the great hall.[4] A considerable sum was expended during these years on the maintenance of the water supply,[5] a new stone barnkyn (barmekin) wall for the garden,[6] a wall to shelter from the wind,[1] and the repair of the stanks, dykes, and hedges in the park.[2]

An allowance of a chalder of oats to the tenants of Casche for the destruction of their crops by the deer, and of eight shillings to the relict of Alan Ewing for the damage "to her land by quarrying,"[3] are by no means isolated examples of the consideration shown for the poor labourers of the ground. James Beaton, Abbot of Dunfermline and Chamberlain of Fife, was the keeper of the palace, and retained the office after he became Archbishop of Glasgow.[4] Besides the deer in the park, there were boars[5] brought there for the royal sport. But who was "The Wylde Lady," who presented herself at Falkland to his Royal Majesty, and for whose expenses the King, by a precept under his hand, ordered ten pounds to be paid beyond the account by Beton in the last year of his reign?[6] It is such entries as these which let in light behind the scenes of the Court.

At Holyrood there appears to have been no building in progress, as the only entries in the accounts relate to the maintenance of the glass.[7] But a new chapel was erected in 1513 at the Castle of Edinburgh,[8] for which timber was brought from the woods of Falkland. The site of this chapel appears to have been under the wall of the castle.

Dunfermline does not seem to have been occupied during this reign as a Palace, though there is a notice of the Queen being there on 20th September and 24th October 1504,[1] and the King visited it in 1490.[2] When there they were the guests of the Abbot.

Although the advent of artillery, and the advance of the standard of what was deemed comfort, doomed the Castles of the Middle Ages to destruction, alterations, and decay, this process was slower in Scotland than in England. It did not set in till Charles II.'s reign. Castles continued to be repaired and built as places of strength as well as of residence when in England the new Tudor was supplanting the old Baronial architecture. The Scottish Kings still retained in all parts of the country, but especially in the Highlands, as a necessary part of government, royal castles, to which they resorted for enforcing law, administering justice, and enjoying sport. The chief royal castles referred to in these accounts in the West Highlands are Dunoon on the Clyde[3] and Carniburg in Mull, of which the Earl of Argyle was keeper.[4] The still more important Castles of Tarbert and Dunaverty in South Kintyre, both of which James had rebuilt in the form of keeps, on or near the site of older castles, do not appear.

In Moray, Elgin Castle was a frequent stage of James on his way to St Duthacs[1] at Tain, and in it a chaplain, endowed by James Dunbar, Earl of Moray, was still maintained.[2] A chapel appears to have been a necessary part of a royal castle. Elgin was an ecclesiastical centre, with the beautiful Cathedral of the See of Moray, the adjacent Priory of Pluscarden, and Convents of the Dominicans and the Franciscan Observantines, who were, as usual, favourites of the King, receiving yearly ten bolls of wheat and the same quantity of barley.[3] Darnaway, on the Findhorn, was also a castle to which the royal pilgrim frequently turned aside on his way to or from St Duthacs.[4] His liaison with the Lady Bothwell had come to an end. But when he visited it in 1507, Margaret Stewart, his natural daughter—whether by her or Margaret Drummond seems not quite certain—was still residing there, and payments are made on her account down to 4th March 1508.[5] In 1509 a cask of wine was bought in prospect of his arrival.[6] In 1510 he halted at Elgin with the Queen, and did not visit Darnaway,[7] but he was there on 8th December 1511.[8] James does not appear to have visited Darnaway after 1511, though he possibly visited St Duthacs in August 1512,[1] and certainly made a rapid journey there to propitiate his favourite saint a month[2] before Flodden. The Castle of Inverness also appears in the accounts as in the custody of Sir Walter Ogilvy of Boyne, who had a fee of £66, 13s. 4d. as its keeper in 1508,[3] an office in which he was succeeded by his son Sir John, who held it to the close of the reign.[4] The King visited it in 1507–8, and again in 1509–10.[5] We learn from a charter under the Great Seal, dated 16th January 1509,[6] that Alexander, Earl of Huntly, then made hereditary Sheriff of Inverness, received along with that office the custody of the castle, and the power of building fortalices and appointing captains, so that Ogilvy must have been the captain under him. The same charter contains in its reddendo a blench fee of a penny, but bound Huntly and his heirs to build on the Castle Hill of Inverness a hall one hundred feet long and thirty wide, with a kitchen and an adjacent chapel.[7] The same nobleman had a few years before received a grant of the site of Inverlochy, on which he bound himself to build a tower.[8] reign was Dingwall,[1] from its central position and the command it gave of the roads to Ross, Caithness, and Sutherland. The Chamberlain of Ross, during this period the Bishop of Caithness, was its keeper, and received as his fee £34, 6s. 8d., besides sheep and cane. A great deal of repair was done,[2] and during the period of the present accounts a mason, two carpenters, and a smith were kept constantly employed.[3] It contained a girnal, in which the grain rents of Ross were stored before being sent south to Leith for the King's use. After the death of James IV., when the Western Isles again broke out into rebellion, the Bishop of Caithness had to take further measures for its fortification, and the introduction of artillery for its defence.[4]

The other castles, either royal or in the King's custody, mentioned in these accounts are Auchterhouse, Blackness, Edinburgh, Darnaway, Dirleton, Doune, Dumbarton, Dunbar, Elgin, Inverness, Newark, and Stirling, but no entry occurs as to most of these except the fee paid to their keepers. The possession of so many castles, as well as the royal palaces, gave the Scottish Kings command of the country during a period when there was no standing army; and it is a just remark of an English traveller at the time of the Union that they possessed more palaces, under which term he no doubt included castles, than the richer monarchs of England.

A brief excursion into the domain of poetry may be pardoned, as a relief from the examination of accounts. William Dunbar was in everything but title Poet Laureate of James IV. He celebrated many of the events of the reign—the King's betrothal and marriage, the reception and death of Bernard Stewart, and the capture of Donald Dubh, the pretender to the Lordship of the Isles. More valuable than these Court poems are the minute touches with which his works everywhere depict the manners of the time—the inconstancy of the King and his courtiers, the amusements of the Queen, the corruption of the Church, the abuses of the Law Courts, the favour shown to parasites like Damian, Abbot of Tungland, who pretended to make gold and to fly, and the neglect of honest servants like Dunbar. The present notice is confined to a few points in which Dunbar's poems and the Records cast light on each other. The Ballad of Lord Bernard Stewart, celebrating his arrival in Scotland, and the Elegy on his death, have been already referred to in the narrative of events. The title given to him by the poet, "Erle of Beaumont le Roger,"[1] is confirmed by that in the accounts, where he is styled "Comes de Bellemonti," but they use the French form, "Berauld" or "Berault," instead of Bernard, as his christian name.

Although James Doig, or Dog, does not appear in the Exchequer Rolls, as in Dunbar's poems,[1] as Keeper of the Queen's Wardrobe, but as an officer in that of the King, this may be explained by the fact that this part of the royal establishment was not kept separate. It may be noted that Doig's name is throughout the accounts spelt Dog, so justifying Dunbar's frequent pun on it.

The "Welcome to the Lord Treasurer,"[2] by Dunbar, was probably addressed to Andrew, Bishop of Caithness, who held that office in 1511 and 1512, and an entry in the accounts for 1512 enables us to assign its probable date. The Chamberlain of Galloway takes credit in that year for six marts delivered towards the expenses of the Lords of Justiciary, Compositors, and Treasurer going to Kirkcudbright and Wigton;[3] and the poem refers to Dunbar's fear that the Treasurer might disappoint him of his pension by going to the Ayres without stopping at Edinburgh—

> "Yett in a pairt I was agast
> Or ye the narrest way had past
> Fra toun of Stirling to the air."

But instead of avoiding Edinburgh, as he might have done by taking the west road from Stirling to Kirkcudbright, he—

> "Keipit tryst so wunder weill
> I hald yow trew as ony steill."

[1] Of James Dog, Kepar of the Quenis Wardrop, Scottish Text Society edition, pp. 195, 197.

[2] Scottish Text Society edition, p. 264.

Another poem,[1] addressed to the Lords of Exchequer, gives a comic view of the poet attempting to account for a loan from the Treasurer he had spent, and brings before us the method of accounting in Exchequer:—

> "For rekkyning of my rentes and roumes
> Ye neid nocht for to tyre your thowmes,
> Na, for to gar your countaris clink
> Nor paper for to spend, nor ink,
> In the ressaueing of my soumes."

The payments to Dunbar are all entered in the books of the Treasurer, not in the Exchequer Rolls, in which his name does not occur. His pension, increased to £80 on 26th August 1510, was paid at that rate for the terms of Martinmas 1511 and Whitsunday and Martinmas 1512; but after the last term there are entries only of payments to account of £2, 2s. on 1st April, the same sum on 13th April, and £2, 16s. on 14th May, the last payment of which there is record.[2] These small sums show both the poverty of the Exchequer and the necessity of Dunbar.

In the poem "On Discretion in Taking," the poet reflects on the oppression of the poor labourer of the ground in the lines—

> "Barronis takis fra the tennentis peure
> All fruct that growis on the feure
> In mailis and gersomes rasit ouir hie,
> And garris thame beg fra dure to dure."

[2] Scottish Text Society edition, p. clvi.

In the Rentals of the Royal Lands[1] in this volume there are frequent examples of such high grassums and fines for entry, yet it is probable the King's tenants were better treated than those of most of the barons.

Dunbar's "Remonstrance to the King"[2] contains allusions to several of the professions and crafts which appear in these accounts. The "Doctouris in Medicyne first begin to be noticed in this reign.[3] The "Musicianis and Menstralis," common in the Courts of all the Scottish Kings, who continued the practice of entertaining them as their Celtic ancestors had done, are of constant occurrence in the Treasurers' Accounts, and are represented in the Exchequer Rolls by the lutists, as well as the hereditary harp-players of the Western Highlands and Galloway.[4]

> "Beildaris of barkis and ballingaris,
> Masounis lyand vpon the land,
> And schip-wrichtis, hewand vpone the strand,"[5] were especially conspicuous at this period, when the palaces or castles were constantly being added to and repaired, and the Royal Docks at Newhaven were busy with the construction of ships of war.

"The glasing wrichtis"[6] were a new trade, owing to the introduction of glass for the royal palaces,[7]

though it did not come into common use for houses till much later, and was not made in Scotland till the 17th century; but stained glass for churches had been made much earlier, for "Richard the glazier" is mentioned in 1237 as at work on the Cathedral of Elgin, and Robert the Bruce had glass in his windows at Cardross in 1329.[1]

Several passages in Dunbar illustrate the curiosity excited by the new development of artillery, which will at a later page be illustrated from the accounts. The "Dream" ends with the bursting of a gun.

> "Than as ane fary thai to dure did frak,
> And schot ane gone that did so rudlie trak,
> Quhill all the air did raird the ranebow vnder.
> On Leith Sandis me thocht scho brak in sounder,
> And I anon did walken with the crak."[2]

In the allegory of "Beauty and the Prisoner" the siege and defence of a castle is briefly but vividly described, and amongst the rest—

> "Lust bur the benner to the wall,
> And Bissinis the grit gyn brocht.
> . . . . .
> Than Bissines the grit gyn bend,
> Straik doun the top of the foir tour."[3]

In "The Flyting" the "schote of gun" is alluded to, which had become necessary even for the trading vessel, to save it from the peril of "men of war," and Kennedy threatens Dunbar that he would be burnt

> "Wyth pik, fyre, ter, gun puldre, or lint, > On Arthuris Sete, or on ane hyar hill."[1]

But the most instructive parts of Dunbar's poems are his constant remonstrances against the favour shown in the bestowal of Church patronage, the pluralities of Sir John Kirkepakkar,[2] and the pride of churchmen, like Forman, Beaton, and Stewart, the Bishop of Caithness, who, as we shall see presently from their record in these accounts, were more occupied with secular affairs than with religious duties.

> Sic pryd with prellattis, so few till preiche and pray,
> Sae hant of harlettis with thame bayth nicht and day,
> That sowld haif ay thair God afoir thair ene,
> So nyce array, so strange to thair abbay,
> Within this land was nevir hard nor sene.
> So mony preistis cled vp in secular weid,
> With blasing breistis casting thair clothis on breid,
> It is no neid to tell of quhome I mene.[3]

Throughout Dunbar's poems there is a tone of melancholy, no doubt heightened by his own situation, but reflecting the vices and weaknesses of the reign of James IV., which has its corresponding reflection in the wastefulness and ultimate deficiency in the royal accounts.

IV.

The different forms of Land Tenure are necessarily represented in the Rolls. The military tenure of Ward, probably the oldest, certainly the normal form, of feudal tenure in Scotland, appears in one of the oppressive incidents from which it derives its name—the casualty which gave to the superior, in return for acting as guardian of a minor or insane heir, the possession and revenues of the vassal's lands during his minority or nonage. One example from the Rolls may illustrate the practical operation of this casualty. In 1508 the baronies of Auchterhouse and Esse (Eassie), in Forfarshire, were in ward through the death of Alexander, Earl of Buchan. This Earl, who died in 1505, was son of James, Earl of Buchan, uterine brother of James II. and Margaret, heiress of Sir Alexander Ogilvy of Auchterhouse, Sheriff of Forfarshire. On his death, his son and heir being a minor, both his maternal estates of Auchterhouse and Esse, in Forfarshire, and his paternal estates in Banff and Aberdeen, fell into ward. The total rental from the Forfarshire baronies was £247, 13s. 4d., with certain grain rents and duties, but this included a sum of £13, 6s. 8d. of arrears.[1] After deducting the terce and conjunct fee of the late Earl's widow, the terces due to the widows of certain sub-vassals, payments to ecclesiastics, a sum allowed for the maintenance of the Castle of Auchterhouse, and a few other charges, there remained £147, 6s. 1d., 6 chalders 6 bolls wheat and barley, 7 sheep, 1 pig, 30 dozen and 3 capons, and 22 dozen and 5 poultry. But from this had still to be deducted the tithe due to the Abbot of Jedburgh and the Prior of Restennet, as well as various allowances to the Master of Ruthven, who acted as the King's Receiver, so that all that reached the royal Exchequer, including the price of grain sold, was £167, 6s. 2d.[1]

In 1509 the royal revenue from the same source was somewhat less,[2] £132, 15s. 6d. The allowance made to the ward appears for the first time, and was only £13, 6s. 8d. In 1510 the gross revenue was much the same as in the previous year (£242, 5s. 8d.), besides grain and duties, and the amount which reached the Royal Exchequer was £134, 6s. 2d. The whole sheep and poultry were retained by the receiver, as well as his fee of £10. In 1512, Andrew, Bishop of Caithness, who had succeeded the Master of Ruthven as receiver, renders an account for two years.[3] The rental remains the same (£234, 6s. 8d.), but the surplus appears to amount only to £91, 2s. 2d., with certain grain rents for each year. The whole of the first year's surplus was paid, by the King's order, to Agnes, Countess of Bothwell, daughter of the late Earl, who married in that year Adam Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell. The surplus of 1512 was paid to the Bishop of Caithness himself[1] in his character as Receiver-General. In the last year of the account, from August 1512 to August 1513, the revenue does not alter;[2] but the only payment to the Royal Exchequer appears to have been £9, 6s. 8d., for which the Controller was to account; and after payment of all expenses the Bishop of Caithness was in arrear £109, 0s. 9d., besides grain, sheep, and duties. The precise cause of this deficiency does not appear.

During the same period the lands of Mount Blairy and others, belonging to the Buchan earldom in Banff and Aberdeen, were also in ward, and Sir William Ogilvy of Strathearn was the chamberlain or receiver. After the expenses and allowances out of these lands had been paid, they yielded in 1513, the last year for which the account is rendered, only £30 to the Royal Exchequer,[3] with a deficit as to the grain rent, which had to be met by a payment out of the customs of Banff, of which Ogilvy was the receiver. John, Master of Buchan, did not serve as heir to his father in the earldom till 29th August 1519;[4] but as no accounts of the ward occur in the Rolls of James v., it is possible he got possession of his estates before that date.

[4] Great Seal Register.

It is evident that both the King and the ward received little under such a system of administration, and it may be conjectured that the real gainers were the receiver himself, or persons to whom the King gave charges upon the ward estate. In some cases, though none of these appear in the present Rolls, the whole revenue was gifted to a royal favourite. Drummond of Hawthornden[1] inveighs against this casualty as an "ungodly custom," and also against that of recognition, by which the whole lands were forfeited if the vassal alienated half, as "not anything better than this." He mentions that these casualties had fallen into disuse by reason of the troubles with England and the civil broils at home; but that in the reign of James,[2] "new Toll-masters, the King giving way to enrich his Exchequer, awakened them," and he adds that James, seeing "the willingness of his subjects to perform, and knowing their great disability thereunto," remitted the rigour of the law, and, "to put away all suspicion, he suffered the promoters and projectors of this polling (i.e., exactions like poll-money), with others of the most active, to be thrown into prison, where some miserably ended their days."

But so far as the Exchequer Rolls afford evidence, there is no proof that the casualty of ward was not rigidly exacted,[1] nor has either Drummond himself or any other historian named the revenue officers who were imprisoned. It would rather appear that "the caterpillars of the State," as he calls them, were allowed to prey upon it till the very close of the reign.

[1] History, pp. 204, 205.

[2] Page 109. Coke on Littleton, pp. 25, 117; Stephen's Blackstone, 11th edition, pp. 187, 236; Williams, Real Property, 16th edition, p. 82.

Not the commencement, but the more common use of feu-farm tenure in Scotland dates from the reign of James IV. and the period included in the present volume. It is worth while to examine the evidence which the Crown rentals afford of the manner in which this tenure was introduced, the causes which led to it, and its consequences. Feu-farm in Scotland was practically the same as the English fee-farm or service tenure as it existed prior to and is recognised in Magna Charta,[2] and as it continued until the Statute Quia Emptores prohibited subinfeudation in the case of alienations by vassals who did not hold of the King in capite. Customs gradually imposed the same restraint on tenants in capite, and their tenure was converted into socage by 12 Charles II. c. 24. The result was that, except in quite anomalous cases, all freehold land in England is held of the Crown directly. It was the holding of a feu or feudal estate in land at a farm (ferma or firma), or rent payable in

[1] The number of smaller estates in ward of which there are accounts is not so great as might be expected. Between 1502 and 1507 there are only three, and from 1507 to 1513 only six of such estates, but many probably were given away to donataries.

money or in kind, with or without certain stipulated services, but free from the military service and other incidents of ward. In burghs, where the whole lands of the burgh were granted to the burgesses for a rent, the celebrated Firma Burgi,[1] this tenure was known as Burgage, and had specialities of its own. It had been known in Scotland at least as early as the Leges Burgorum, which belong in great part to the epoch of David I. (1124–53), and to no portion of which a date later than 1295 has been assigned. The 95th section of these laws bears the express title, "De terris datis ad feodofirmam," and preserves a right of pre-emption in favour of the granter of land in feu-farm, "Statutum est si quis dederit alicui terram suam ad feodofirmam salva sibi et suis quedem firma nominata et postea feodofirmarius necessitate compulsus voluerit dictam terram vendere ipse qui dedit dictam terram ad feodifirmam et sui erunt propinquiores ad dictam terram emendam quam aliquis alius."[2] A fragment of burgh law of uncertain but old date prohibited the feodofirmarius from subletting his land without resigning it in the hands of the lord or granter, and declared that until this was done the firmarius or farmer of the soil could not have the freedom of the burgh, "for two men are not able at one and the same time to have the freedom from one and the same burgage tenement."[1]

These laws refer to burgage or feu-farm within burgh, but a series of charters prove its existence in lands outside of burghs.[2] Thus in the Register of Kelso, of a date not later than 1180, John, Abbot of Kelso, with consent of the Chapter, granted to Osbern and his heirs half a carrucate of land within the territory of Middleham, with a reddendo of eight shillings yearly, half at Whitsunday and half at Martinmas, and three days' peat service of two men, and three days' ploughing.[3] In 1204 there is a grant by William the Lion in favour of Malcolm, Earl of Fife, as heir-nominate of Uchtred of Bingouer, of the lands of Bingouer, "to be held by him and his heirs, of me and my heirs, in feu and heritage, justly, fully, and honourably rendering therefrom the rent which to that land pertains—to wit, four chalders of oatmeal, and four merks, and four pair of capons, or eight shillings, and performing the forensic service which to that land belongs." About 1226 there is a charter of resignation of Hubert, Abbot of Kelso, with consent of the Chapter, in favour of Reginald Wood and his heirs, of the lands of Easter Duddingston, with half the peat-moss of Cameron, in which the reddendo is "ten merks of silver at two terms—five, to wit, at the nativity of St John the Baptist, and five at Martinmas, and performing the forensic service to the Lord the King, and to me, so far as pertains to the third part of one term."[1] A similar reddendo is proved by a receipt, dated July 1271,[2] to have been the tenure of the lands of Draffrane, held of the same monastery.

About 1300 there is a feu-charter by Alan, perpetual vicar of the Church of Glasgow, with consent of the Chapter, to Sir John of Carrick, of certain lands within the burgh of Glasgow, in feu-farm, "rendering therefrom yearly to me and my successors' sacristans three shillings of silver, to wit, 18 pennies at Whitsunday and 18 pennies at Martinmas, and so on from year to year, and term to term, payment shall be made of the said feu-farm for ever."[3] So in a charter of Robert the Bruce, of uncertain date, there is a reddendo of eleven pounds of sterlings, at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas by equal portions, and the forensic service of half a knight.[4] This, as well as some of the deeds previously quoted, are examples of a combination of feu and ward tenures.[5] About 1360 there is a charter of confirmation of John Graham (de Gram), Lord of Tarbolton, of two grants by his grandfather in favour of Henry of Graham, his uncle, of certain lands in the barony of Abercorn, and of the land of Blyth in Tweeddale, to be exempt from ward and relief, rendering yearly "for the land of Blyth two gilt spurs, or at the pleasure of the said Henry and his heirs and assignees, 12 pennies of sterlings in name of feu-farm, and 1 penny only for the lands of Maxiston and Philipston in name of feu-farm," a reddendo no doubt approaching to blench-farm, but distinguishable from it by the absence of the words "if asked only," and by the express designation of feu-farm applied to it. In 1402 there is a charter in feu-farm, with a reddendo of £3 yearly, of the lands of Carriston, by James Fraser de Ferendracht, to the Abbot and Chapter of Melrose,[1] which was confirmed by James I. in 1425.[2]

The statute 1457, c. 71, which declared it "speedful that the King begin and give example to the lave" in letting lands in feu-farm, was passed to encourage the tenure of feu-farm which already existed, by saving the feu-farmers of the King's ward vassals when the casualty of ward fell. Immediately before and subsequently to this statute there are many instances of charters of feu-farm in the Great Seal Register, as of the lands of Bonfield and Ferryfield to the community of Cupar in 1452,[3] the lands of Balcarres to Robert Hunter in 1456,[4] and in 1458 the lands of Brodiland in Kincardine to John Lindesay,[1] the lands of Petgerny, in the same county, to John de Strathachan,[2] and the lands of Drumtennant, in Fife, to Thomas Andrew, Burgess of Cupar.[3] In 1459 James II. created a number of feus at Falkland under the obligation to provide hostelry accommodation for men and horses.[4] It was these feuars who became the first burgesses of the new royal burgh of Falkland. During the reign of James III. the grants of lands in feu-farm are much less numerous, though a few instances occur, as in the case of Balkerous (Balcarres), which was regranted in feu to the sons of Robert Hunter in 1465–6;[5] the lands of Drumgrey, in Dumfries, to Gilbert de Johnstoun in 1472,[6] Greenyards to John Learmonth in 1473,[7] Roseneath to John Colquhoun of Luss, in the same year;[8] Duncavloch to John, Earl of Athole;[9] Duffus, in Elgin, to James Douglas in 1477;[10] Largo, in Fife, to Andrew Wood in 1483.[11] Apparently it was doubted whether the Act 1457 entitled the King to grant feus of the lands annexed to the Crown; and accordingly the statute 1503, c. 90, removed this doubt, and declared that "it sall be leifful to his hienesse to set all his proper landes, baith annexed and unannexed in few-ferme . . . . .

And that the landis that he settis in his time, as said is, stand perpetually to the aires, after the form of their condition." A clause follows which has been sometimes overlooked: "And after his decease, the annexations, quhilkis ar maid of before, sall returne againe to their awin nature; swa that his successours sall not have power to annalie, nor set in few, mair then they had before the making of this Statute."

The permission to grant lands in feu-farm was a special favour to James IV., as well as the tenants of the ground. It enabled him, without the appearance of oppression, to levy fines or grassums on the substitution of a feu for a lease, and these fines were of periodical recurrence on each change of ownership. In most cases the transition was accompanied by an increase in the annual payment or rent. On the other hand, the obtaining security of tenure at a fixed rent, and the escape from the risks of Ward, Marriage, Recognition, and other feudal casualties and services due to the superior under the stricter military tenure of ward, were advantages so great that whenever they could afford it the tenants of the ground took advantage of the law and became feu-farmers. In some cases they were also relieved from other services. Thus the feuars of Fife were no longer to carry hay.[1] It was an additional incentive to the conversion of leases into feu farms that, as regards the King's annexed lands, the privilege was confined to the life of James IV.

Some obstacles appear to have occurred which delayed the operation of the Act of 1503. The first application of it on a large scale was in the case of the tenants of Bute under a Charter of 16th August 1506. This Charter proceeds on the preamble that "the tenants and inhabitants of Bute" had been "from of old infeft in the manner of feu-farm (in modum infeodifirme)," and grants their respective possessions at the old rents and the fine of a duplicand on the entry of the heir male.[2]

In 1507 and the following years the tenure of feu-farm began again to be occasionally used both for small and large estates[3]—even for baronies.[4] But from the beginning of 1509 a more general process set in of converting the royal tenants into feuars, the evidence of which is to be chiefly found in the Rentals printed in this volume. In the case of the more important holdings, it was subsequently confined by the issue of Royal Charters of feu-farm, which are to be found in the Register of the Great Seal. From this time to the end of the reign it may be said that feu-farm became the almost universal tenure of small parcels of lands, and a very usual tenure even of larger estates granted by the Crown.

The Rentals of Fife afford the best example of the manner in which feu-farm tenure was at this period generally introduced. The earldom of that county, or kingdom, as it was popularly called, had been created in favour of Macduff, its Celtic chief or king, by Malcolm Canmore in 1057, with the well-known special privileges usually described as the reward of his assistance against Macbeth, but perhaps more truly due to a compromise by which the feudal system supplanted the ancient Celtic customary law in this part of Scotland, and the Celtic chief ceded his sovereign or supreme rights. Duncan, the last male heir of Macduff, was at the battle of Durham in 1346, but survived at least till 1350, in which year he granted a charter of the patronage of the Church of Auchtermuchty to the Abbot of Lindores.[1] He had no son, but left a daughter, Isobel, who married, first, Sir William Ramsay, and, secondly, Walter Stewart, son of Robert II., and brother of Robert, Earl of Menteith and Duke of Albany. Albany, who governed Scotland during the later years of his father and the reign of his brother, Robert III., procured a tailzie or settlement in 1371 by which the Countess[1] resigned the earldom in his favour, and both Albany and his son Murdoch bore that title in addition to that of Earl of Menteith and Duke of Albany. Upon Murdoch's forfeiture, after the return of James I. from England, the Earldom of Fife was annexed to the Crown by Parliament in 1455, and continued to be so in subsequent reigns. There was from this time no Earl of Fife until the titular dignity was by a strange anomaly granted as an Irish peerage in 1759 in favour of William Duff of Braco, ancestor of the present Duke. Its Rental regularly appears in the Crown Rental Books from 15th March 1482[2]—the first extant—onwards. The lands so annexed, however, embraced only a portion of the modern county. They did not include the Church lands, the large estates belonging to the See of St Andrews, the Priory of St Andrews, the Abbey of Dunfermline, the monasteries of Pittenweem, Balmerino, and Lindores. They represent what remained of the ancient earldom or Comitatus, which in the rental of 1482 is divided into the quarters of Eden, Largo, Falkland, Auchtermuchty, and Lindores.[3] These lands were distinct from the lands of the shire or county,[1] and were sometimes called the Lordship, sometimes the Stewartry.[2] The revenues from them were not collected by the Sheriff but by the King's Chamberlain or Steward, an office which afterwards became hereditary in the Duke of Athol. The Sheriffdom proper was also divided into four quarters, but the quarters were different —Eden, Leven, Inverkeithing, and Dunfermline— each of which had a serjeant with a fee of £1.[3] The lands in the Stewartry Quarter of Eden are distinct from those in the Sheriffdom Quarter of the same name, and do not appear in the Return of the Inquest of 1517. In all the Rentals down to that of 1508 the Stewartry lands are let for periods of three years by the Royal Commissioners to certain tenants, either severally or in joint tenancy.[4] In the latter case the portions of the joint tenants are sometimes specified and sometimes not. When not specified, they were entirely cultivated on the runrig system, but even when divided into so many parts—fourths, twelfths, sixteenths, or other fractions—they may have been so, for the boundaries of the parts are not given. In the Rental of 1508, in a few cases it is noted that the holding is feu-farm. The lands, mill, and brewhouse of Rathillet are said to be let in feu-farm to Sir Alexander Lindsay for the foresaid terms, i.e., three years, so that it cannot have been an absolute fee; and the fulling mill and ward of Cupar are said to be claimed by the burgesses in feu-farm.[1] But in the Rental of 4th March 1509 a great change appears. It is entitled "Assedatio Dominii de Fife inchoata apud Edinburgh in Feodifirma Quarto Die Mensis Martii Anno Domini 1509."[2] All prior Rentals bore to be "Assedationes,"[3] or leases merely. Almost all the lands are now set or granted in feu-farm and no longer under leases. An example may be taken from the four chief quarters. In Lindores Quarter, Den-Mill (Molendinum de Dene), which had been let in 1508 to John Balfour for three years at the rent of £2, 13s. 4d., with a grassum of the same amount, is entered as let in feu-farm at £6, 13s. 4d. and twelve capons, the fee for entry being remitted. In the next Rental of 1516,[4] it continues at the same feu-duty, the feuars being the relict of John Balfour for her life, and her son in fee. In Largo Quarter, Balcarres, which had been let in 1508 for £5, 6s. 8d. money, besides victual, and its mill for £1, 6s. 8d.—together, £6, 13s. 4d., are now let in feu farm to George Crichton, in Stirling, in fee, and Margaret Crichton in life-rent, in feu farm for £25, 13s. 7d., and practically the same grain rent, with a composition of £30 for the new infeftment. On 23rd July 1511 the feus of these lands were transferred to Sir John Stirling of Keir with the royal consent. The feu-duty having been fixed, it disappears from subsequent Rentals, and Sir John Stirling received a Crown Charter, which appears in the Great Seal Register of 24th July 1511.[1]

In the Quarter of Falkland, Balbrekie, which in 1508 had been let for three years to Archibald Beaton for £4, and 1 chalder 4 bolls barley, 2 chalders 8 bolls oats, and 24 capons, with a grassum of £4,[2] is in 1509 granted in feu-farm at a feu-duty of £8; 1 chalder 4 bolls barley, 2 chalders 8 bolls oats, and 24 capons, to John Douglas, in the King's wine-cellar, with a fee for entry of £26, 13s. 4d.[3] On 4th March 1510 Douglas got a feu-charter in the same terms to himself and his wife Margaret Wood, in conjunct fee, and the heirs male of the marriage, whom failing, his own heirs male, whom failing, the eldest heir female.

In the Quarter of Auchtermuchty the lands called Le Casche, and a house standing on its common, which had been let in 1508 for three years to twelve tenants, in various shares, at a total rent of £8, 8s. 4d., 5 chalders of oats and 2 chalders 8 bolls of barley, are in 1509 set in feu-farm to Alexander Scot, brother of Sir W. Scot of Balwery, and his brother Thomas, in two equal halves, at a feu-duty of £24, 6s. 8d., 2 chalders 8 bolls barley, 5 chalders oats, 12 hawks, and 72 poultry, with a feu of £24, 6s. 8d. for the entry, but under the condition that they should not remove the existing tenants for their lives, they paying the above stipulated rent. Similar cases might be repeated indefinitely,[1] not only from the Fife Rentals but from the other annexed estates of the King. It is obvious how largely by such methods the royal revenue was raised. The mode of raising it was, however, the proverbial one of killing the goose that laid the golden eggs. The Exchequer lost the future increase in value of these estates, except in so far as it was represented by the casual and uncertain fines for entry. In the case of smaller holdings it produced an opposite and immediate evil, for as many tenants could with difficulty pay their rents, still less could they pay the increased feu-duty, and had to allow others to take their holdings. Lyndsay, in the next reign, complains of this—

> "And now begins ane plague among them new,
> That gentillmen thair steadings taks in few,
> Thus maun they pay great ferme or lay their stead." [2]

The question has been often put, why there was and is no tenure in Scotland corresponding to the English tenure of copyhold, which is defined by Blackstone as the holding "by that species of tenants called copyholders of lands substantially their own property, though nominally part of the lord's demesnes which are entered on the rolls of the customary court of the manor as holders at the will of the lord according to the custom."[1] Mr Paterson, in his "Compendium of English and Scottish Law" gives the erroneous answer, "Copyhold, a kind of English tenure = Scotch Feudal Tenure or Feu-holding."[2] Other writers have more correctly remarked that examples of what was practically copyhold, though not so named, are to be found in Scotland in the Booking Tenure of the tenants of the Abbey of Paisley, whose title consisted in their being entered in the Books or Rolls of the Abbot as Lord of the Manor, and in the kindly tenants or rentallers of Lochmaben, Prestwick, Newton, or Ayr, and other places, who were at one time a considerable body of tenants holding their lands for fixed rents or dues payable to the Crown or the Church, but who (when they did not take advantage of the opportunity of converting their leases into feus), with the exception of the kindly tenants of Lochmaben, who were protected by royal warrants,[3] were reduced to the position either of liferent tenants or tenants at will

under the statutes of the end of the sixteenth century.[1]

This class of tenants, whose origin was precisely the same as the English copyholders, "being descended," as Coke puts it, "though meanly yet of an ancient house, to wit, the villeins of the feudal times who had acquired a customary and alienable right to their holdings," were in Scotland never so numerous as in England, nor were their rights, which were deemed exceptions from feudal tenure, well defined. In particular, with some very rare and limited exceptions, they had no right to alienate their holdings. No custom like that of Ulster obtained in any part of Scotland. Practically such tenants ceased to exist owing to the more complete adoption of the Feudal System of Land Tenure in Scotland[2]; nor were they ever called Copyholders, a term which will be sought in vain in Scottish Law Books and Statutes. The rental of Menteith of 6th February 1509 contains, however, what is believed to be a solitary instance of the use of the word Copyhold in Scotland. "One-half of the Parkland of Doune[3] is said in that Rental to be let to Walter Badynauch at 20s., and to Archibald Edmonstone at 20s., with marts, for

[2] And the absence of a king's court strong enough to maintain the copyholder against his lord. In England the king's court dates from Henry II. as the central and supreme court; in Scotland only from James V. Williams' Real Property, 16th ed., p. 402, points out how the king's court protected the copyhold tenure.

[3] Pages 634, 635.

the terms of nine years, under the conditions of the Copyhold (cum conditionibus de le Copihald)." In the previous Rental, of 4th May 1508, it had been let to Archibald Edmonston and Walter Warden for 20s., with carriages and services.[1]

The Copyhold in this instance referred to is the entry of these lands as let subject to certain conditions in the Rental Book of the Earldom of Menteith, and probably the services mentioned in the Rental of 1508 were the conditions. Some, but it is difficult to say how much, consideration was shown in many cases to the villein tenants in Scotland, who had no title to their holdings but the will of the King. When such holdings were converted into feus they often appear to have had a preference; or if other persons became the feuars, it was under reservation of the liferent of the old tenants. Of this there are several examples in the present Rentals. Thus Branquhalzie, in Menteith, was granted to George Schaw in feu-farm, with the condition "that he should not remove the poor occupiers during their lives;"[2] and Robert Colville of Ochiltre got a grant of Tillicoultry in feu-farm as a free barony with a similar condition.[3] In the case of Kings Barns, in the Quarter of Largo, we see an instance of the old tenants competing with new feu-farmers and successfully retaining their holdings.[4] These lands had been set in four parts to Peter Arnot and others in feu-farm on 4th March 1509, but on 31st July 1511 the tenants obtained a cancellation of the grant, and took their holdings themselves in feu-farm. But the old tenants never, as in England, became copyholders with an estate which was superior to tenancy, though inferior to complete or freehold ownership. The reason of this difference is to be found in the fact that Feudalism, as a system of tenure, both in the original form of ward and in the modified form of feu-farm, retained its hold much longer in Scotland than in England, where already, in the reign of Edward I., the statute of Quia Emptores had broken down the older plan of subordinate tenures, and declared that all vassals should hold directly of the Crown. In Scotland it was necessary to hold directly of the Crown to be a freeholder; but it was possible to hold a feudal estate or feu-farm from a mid-superior or vassal, either of the Crown or of another superior. Such estate was quite different from the English copyhold. The Scottish barons, who answered to the English lords of the manor, did not permit the growth of a custom by which the actual tillers of the soil became its owners by copyhold. Instead of this, they imitated their own feudal holding of the King in cases in which they granted such tillers of the soil a feu of their farms, and in all other cases the occupiers continued to be either tenants-at-will or for a term of years, usually short. The nineteen years lease was originally introduced by the ecclesiastical landlords, and only by degrees extended to other leases.

It is a distinct question whether or not there had been in any part of Scotland the so-called system of village communities antecedent to the introduction of the feudal baronies, which answered to the English manors. On this question, which has been so much discussed by Von Maurer, Nasse, Maine, Seebohm, Gomme, and other German and English writers in recent times, the present Rolls throw no direct light, and it is beyond the scope of this Preface to enter upon its discussion.[1] So far as the state of matters in the commencement of the sixteenth century is concerned, there is no evidence of customary rights to land independent of the King or feudal lords, lay or ecclesiastical. The land of Scotland had been many centuries before divided into feudal estates holding of the King or his barons. The tenants or "puir labourers of the ground," as they are called in the Scottish statutes, were either tenants-at-will or for a short period of years. They were liable to be dispossessed by the sale of the lord's estate prior to the Act 1449, c. 17, when they had leases, and those who had none were liable to instant removal until the Act 1491, c. 26, which gave them possession to the first term of Whitsunday. Even subsequent to these Acts they could be evicted at the next term of Whitsunday at will if they had no lease, or at the expiry of the lease. No doubt in practice they generally were allowed to continue to hold so long as they paid their rents, but their rents might be raised, and they never acquired a customary title which the law recognised.

[1] Such inquirers will, however, find much in these rentals worthy of their attention. It is, of course, open to argument that the Scottish villeins had a customary right which was unknown by the feudal system. To discuss this point is also beyond the limits of this Preface.

For the mortifications or grants to the Church—the Scottish name for mortmains during this period—reference must be made to the Register of the Great Seal, where the royal confirmations of such grants are to be found on almost every page, for Scotland had no statutes, like the English Acts against mortmain. But the present volume contains one instructive example. By charter, dated 18th June 1506,[1] the King, in consideration of "his special devotion to the glorious Confessor St Columba and his favour" for George Brown, Bishop of Dunkeld, granted a charter of novodamus of the lands of Muckersy and Arntully in mortmain to the See of Dunkeld in excambion for the cane of Kingorn and the domain lands of Abercorn, and added to the grant the whole lands, forest, and woods of Birnam and Logy, with the mill and the "forestar settis" of Birnam, incorporating the whole in the Barony of Dunkeld. Muckersy and Arntully were given in pure alms, with prayers, as the only reddendo. For Birnam and Logy forty shillings a year was to be paid, and credit is given for the payment in the accounts of the Chamberlain of Kinclevin.[1] George Brown, who possessed this mortification, was the prelate of whose life and death Alexander Myln has given so graphic a narrative in the Lives of the Bishops of Dunkeld. He took little part in public affairs. His whole incumbency of the See, from 1484 to his death in 1514, was devoted to the administration and enlargement of the bishopric and its revenues.

The manner in which he added estate after estate to its property by purchase, suits, and gifts is strikingly brought out in Mylne's narrative.[2] The acquisition of the lands in this charter is duly chronicled amongst the rest, and the fact is mentioned that he was threatened with eviction from the lands of Muckersy as real warrandice for the cane of Kingorn, but succeeded in preventing this by a suit before the Lords of Council.

His own benefactions during life were numerous, and his will, a model of brevity, was in these lines: "Deo, Virgini gloriosæ, et patrono Sancto Columbæ animam lego; bona Sancti Columbæ mihi incumbentia in reparationem ecclesiæ, pontis, et pauperibus in eleemosinam lego; executores constituo precentorem archidiaconum et officialem."[3] A bishop of the type which frequently repeated itself, whose whole energies were concentrated on the emolument of the Church, not of himself, the pride of the monkish churchman is yet betrayed by the wish Brown accomplished, to be able to ride from one to another of his palaces wholly through the lands of the See.

But while the greater acquisitions of the Church are absent from these accounts, they afford much incidental evidence of the constant flow of money from lay into ecclesiastical lands which was destined to be so rudely reversed at the Reformation, when one extreme led to the opposite.

Under this head we notice the occurrence of numerous payments to Chaplains,[1] sometimes officiating in the Parish Church,[2] sometimes in the royal castles,[3] in each of which there was a chapel, sometimes at places of special sanctity.[4]

nican but also Carmelites, Trinity, and others who, in spite of vows of poverty, were sturdy beggars and constant recipients of the royal gifts. It would be tedious to go through the whole list. The Fratres Minores de Observantiâ of Stirling, who were specially favoured by James IV., may be taken as an example. The Observantines, a reform of the older Franciscans afterwards called for distinction Conventuals, had convents at Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Ayr, Perth, Stirling, Glasgow, St Andrews, Elgin, and Jedburgh. The Conventuals had convents at Berwick, Roxburgh, Haddington, Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, Lanark, Inverkeithing, and Dunbar. In the present volume the Observantine houses of Elgin and Stirling, both places of the King's special resort, receive the most numerous donations. The Elgin convent received 10 bolls of wheat yearly,[1] to which 10 bolls of barley was added in 1508.[2]

The Stirling Convent received £6 for six months in 1508, which seems to have been at the rate of 5s. a week,[3] besides 8 bolls of wheat[4] and 8 bolls of malt.[5] The Dumfries Convent had £13, 6s. 8d.;[6] that of Dundee had £5; that of Kirkcudbright 5 marks, as well as the whole fines of the burgh, amounting to £6, 13s. 4d.,[7] a grant probably made by James on one of his pilgrimages to Whithern.

Besides the Franciscans, the houses of the Dominicans,[1] which were to be found in almost every burgh, had similar annuities, and so had the Carmelite and Trinity Friars of Aberdeen, and the Sisters of Martha and St Clara at Campvere.[2] The older orders, the Canons Regular of St Augustus, the Benedictines, and Cistercians, had been still more richly endowed by earlier kings, from Malcolm Canmore to Robert III., and there are frequent references to their lands in these accounts, as those of the Prior and Convent of St Andrews, the Abbot and Monastery of Dunfermline, the Abbots of Holyrood, Coupar, Lindores, Arbroath, and others. The Deans and Chapters of the Cathedrals had separate emoluments, chiefly in lands. Money payments also occur to particular altars for masses and for candles.[3] The lepers at one place, the east end of Stirling Bridge,[4] receive alms; and the Treasurers' Accounts show that James was charitable to the poor. The convents, it is fair to remember, were to a great extent the poorhouses of this period. The Mediæval Church, with all its corruptions, at least partially solved the problem which still perplexes modern civilisation.

V.

The Crown Lands remained practically the same as in the preceding volume, with the exception of the addition of the earldom of Sutherland. It is proposed to examine specially only the accounts of that earldom, but a few other accounts will be referred to in connection with the Chamberlain's Receivers or Lessees who rendered them.

The first, and indeed only, appearance of the earldom of Sutherland amongst the lands for whose revenue an account was rendered to the Crown, was an important event. It brought that distant district within the cognisance of royal officials, primarily for fiscal, but through these for other purposes of Government. The situation was something like that of a mediatised Indian State. The minority or incapacity of the native ruler gave the Crown opportunity to assert its authority. In this case it was the incapacity of the heir to the earldom which prevented him from taking the necessary steps for entering with the Crown, and placed his estate in non-entry. On the death, in 1508, of John, eighth Earl of Sutherland, in direct male descent from Hugh Freskin, a Fleming, who held between 1186 and 1204 the lands of Sutherland (which, probably erroneously, are supposed to have been made an earldom by Malcolm Canmore in 1057, in the person of their Celtic Chief called Mor Fheir Chat, the great man or chief of the Catti), the succession opened to John, his only legitimate son. This John was, or was alleged to be, an idiot, and was certainly incapable of maintaining his own rights. Adam Gordon, husband of his sister Elizabeth, son of George and brother of Alexander, Lord Huntly, the most powerful noble in the north-east of Scotland, determined to obtain the earldom in right of his wife. He accordingly took out a brief of service in her favour as heir to her father before his brother, Lord Huntly, as Sheriff of Inverness, on 12th May 1509,[1] but the service being invalid as her brother was alive, Gordon next proceeded to serve John himself as heir on 24th July 1509,[2] and obtained on the following day a renunciation of any claim to the earldom in favour of John and Elizabeth Sutherland and their heirs by Alexander Sutherland, a youth of eighteen, commonly alleged to be a bastard of the late Earl. Gordon did not, however, succeed in procuring the infeftment of his brother-in-law in the earldom till 24th December 1512. The consequence was that the earldom was in non-entry from 1508 to the end of 1512. Sir Robert Gordon states that "Andrew Stewart, Bishop of Caithness, did compose and agree in his Majesty's name with Adam Gordon for the non-entry, and made accompt to the King's Exchequer for the Retour Duty of the said Earldom for three years, as appears by the Exchequer Rolls, 1510, 1511, 1512."[1] The Rolls, now extant, are only for the three terms from 30th April 1509 to 6th September 1510,[2] and for two terms from 6th September 1511 to 23th July 1512.[3] The first of these bears that the Lordship and Earldom of Sutherland was now in the hands of the King, "Ratione non-introitus veri heredis jus suum non prosequentis," and it is probable that the administration by the Bishop of Caithness was against rather than with the consent of Adam Gordon. The Bishop was naturally chosen as Chamberlain, for his diocese included Sutherland, and Dornoch was his cathedral. This account affords some, though brief, particulars of the lands then held by the Earls of Sutherland both in property and tenandry. The distinction between property and tenandry (proprietas and tenandria) was that the former lands were held by the Earl and the latter by tacksmen, called in the Rolls "libere tenentes" or free tenants. The same word is used for free holders, but it is convenient to use the translation free tenants to distinguish them from the free holders who held directly of the Crown, and were alone present or represented in the Scottish Parliament.[1] The free tenant of a barony, although he paid rent (ferme), apparently did not pay grassums or fines.[2] The actual cultivators of the soil are in no instance referred to, and both in the property and tenandry the revenues collected for the King, as superior of the Earl, are called fermes, consisting of money or produce. The property lands paid what was estimated as their annual value, and the tenandry lands paid the rent, which would otherwise have been paid to the Earl by the tacksmen or free tenants, and which in both cases appears to have been the Retour Duty. No right is referred to as belonging to the cultivating class, or to the members of any clan. The lands described can be almost, without exception, identified, though the spelling has slightly altered in some cases. The property lands include many well-known names, as Lairg, Golspie, Dunrobbin, Uppat, Loth, Helmsdale, Kildonan, Kinbrace, Brora, and others—in fact, almost all the best lands of the southern and eastern part of the country. They are divided in several cases expressly into Dalwati or Davachs, the Gaelic name for a district supposed to correspond to 4 ploughgates or 32 oxgangs or 416 acres,[3] which itself appears in the names of parcels of land, e.g., Dawach Free (in Strath Free) and Dawach Deir. Besides the usual fermes of money, corn, cattle, sheep, and poultry, there occur several of "wethyis of iron."[1] The number of sheep (and frequently it is only a portion of one) can scarcely have been great, as three is the largest number in any rental. The total rent of the property lands was £103, 4s. 8d., 8 chalders, 8 bolls barley, 30¼ marts, 8 poultry, 43 sheep, 3 chalders oats, and 253 wethyis of iron.

The tenandry lands include, as might be expected, several outlying parts of Sutherland, as Eddrachellis and Coule in Assynt, also most of the lands in the present parishes of Clyne and Rogart, and even lands in the immediate vicinity of Dunrobbin, as Backie, Drummuie, and Colmkill, now Gordonbush, in the parish of Golspie, and Kilpedir and Strathully in Helmsdale. The free tenants of these lands were William Clyne, who held the lands of Clynelis (Clynelish), Kirkclyne, and Mylton; John Sutherland of Drummoy; James Dunbar of Colmkill; Andrew Kynard of Petrale, who held these lands and also Langwell and Carrale; Y. M'Ky, who held the lands of Ord, probably on the border of Caithness; Hugh Sutherland, who held the lands of Castletown; and Janet Terrel, "lady and free tenant" of the lands of Inchkep. There are, however, many parcels of land of which the free tenant is not expressly mentioned, and it seems uncertain whether they were in the hands of the tenant last named in the list or of other persons. The rent is, with one or two exceptions in barley, payable in money, and is entered at the Retour Duty or old extent of the lands, which are divided with remarkable uniformity, and few exceptions, into 20 shilling, 40 shilling, and £4 lands. The total rental of the tenandry lands was £147, 13s. 4d. and 7 chalders of barley. On the discharge side of the account we notice the terce of the late Countess Margaret,[1] widow of John, the seventh Earl, as well as the second terce of Catherine,[2] widow of John, the eighth Earl. This lady is apparently in error called Margaret by Douglas in his Peerage,[3] and Sir Robert Gordon in his History.[4] Alexander Sutherland, described as the son of the late Earl John, receives 40 marks under letters of the King to the Auditors. This refers to the son, probably illegitimate, of the late Earl, who had opposed the service of his legitimate brother John in 1509, but whose curators had agreed to renounce his claims in favour of Earl John and his sister Elizabeth, in consideration of an infeftment in lands of 40 marks of which Adam Gordon gave him charter and sasine in open court.[5] It is, perhaps, now impossible to ascertain the exact facts as to Alexander Sutherland, who attempted to set aside by force of arms the compromise made by his curators, aided by his brother-in-law, Y. Roy M'Ky of Strathnaver, in 1516, when he was killed, and his head placed on a spear on the Tower of Dunrobbin. It was keenly contested between Lord Hailes and Sir Robert Gordon, in the Pleadings in the Sutherland Case, whether Alexander Sutherland was or was not a bastard. Lord Hailes maintained the negative,[1] and Sir Robert Gordon, against the view of his ancestor, the author of the History of the Earls of Sutherland, the affirmative. The object of the former was to support the precedent of a female heir to the earldom, having succeeded on the death of her brother John and that of the latter to show that her succession was illegal, as an heir male existed in the person of Alexander. Both writers, it must be remembered, were arguing a peerage case. It may be noticed, however, that Alexander is not called a natural son in the Rolls; and he may very likely have been the offspring of a handfast or Celtic customary marriage. However this may be, it is impossible to look back historically on the events which attended the passage of the earldom from the Sutherlands to the Gordons without sharing the opinion[2] that Adam Gordon used the machinery of the law and the great influence of the Huntly family, both in the North of Scotland and at the Court of James, to oust the claims both of John and Alexander Sutherland, by treating the former as an idiot and the latter as a bastard. While it is not impossible that there was, as Lord Hailes contends, some basis for both assertions, the nature of the legal proceedings adopted, which will be presently referred to, appear very unsatisfactory.

[1] Vol. xii. p. 23. The rent of Duchra in Monteith was also paid partly in iron wethys (of iron), here used for a measure. The early mining and manufacture of iron in Scotland has been traced in a learned paper by Mr W. Ivison Macadam in the Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, vol. ix. (N.S.), 1886–7, p. 89. As to the Sutherland workings, see p. 113.

Another payment in the accounts to William Jamieson alias Sutherland, for a garrison of eight men in Dunrobbin, is no doubt explained by the fear of an attack on the part of supporters of the claim of Earl John or of Alexander Sutherland.

The account for 1512[1] is an abstract, and does not name the lands. The property rental is the same as in 1510, but the tenandry rental is diminished by the failure of certain tenants to pay their rents. Earl John receives payment of £100, made to Cuthbert Baillie as his guardian,[2] which proves that he was still alive. In fact, on the 24th December of this year, his attorney took sasine of the Earldom of Sutherland in his favour, under a Precept of Chancery of 6th August, and proceeding on the Inquest of 25th July 1509. This put an end to the Crown possession of Sutherland. It was not till the next reign that an assize to try a brief of idiotcy actually met at Perth on 13th June 1514.[1] Apparently no decree was pronounced. The record of the proceedings significantly states that, immediately before the assize left the Court, the Earl, who was himself present, in answer to the question who should succeed to him, replied, his sister Elizabeth, wife of Adam Gordon, and that he chose Adam Gordon and John Sutherland, a burgess of Elgin, as his curators. Such a question and answer appear to show he was not a complete idiot, though probably he may have been of weak mind. Whatever was the real meaning of these suspicious proceedings, Earl John did not long survive the Inquest, and his sister was at last served heir to the earldom on 30th June 1515, her husband assuming the title in her right.

Y., sometimes called John, sometimes Odo Mackay, referred to in the accounts as the free tenant of the lands of Ord, and also of others, rented at 24 bolls of barley,[2] was the ancestor of Donald, first Lord Reay, and the large possessions and power of the clan, of which he was the head, were largely due to his conduct in supporting the royal authority in Sutherland. Alexander Sutherland of Dirlot, cousin-german of Robert, sixth Earl of Sutherland, having slain Alexander Dunbar, brother of Sir James Dunbar of Cumnock, and husband of the widow of John, seventh Earl of Sutherland, Mackay succeeded in arresting him and ten of his accomplices, who were all executed.[1] In return for this service he received a charter, with a blench reddendo of a red rose, in 1499, of the lands of Farr, Armadale, Strathy, Rynivee, Kynald, Gollespie, Dylrid, Cattaeh, Bronych, Kilcolmkill in Strathbrora, Davoch-Lochnaver, Davoch-Eriboll, and two-tenths of the lands of Stromay, in Caithness and Sutherland, which had been forfeited by Alexander Sutherland for treason.[2] He held also the tower of Golspie.[3]

For a similar service, in apprehending Torquil M'Leod of the Lewis, Y. Mackay received a liferent grant of the lands of Assynt and Ladathchogich on 6th March 1508.[4] On 8th August 1511 he obtained letters of legitimation of his sons, John and Donald, under the Privy Seal,[5] the former of whom succeeded to him on his death in 1516. He had two legitimate daughters by his wife, a daughter of Lord Lovat,[6] one of whom married Angus Macleod of Assynt, and the other, as has been noticed, Alexander Sutherland, the claimant to the Earldom. The rivalry between the Sutherlands and the Mackays, who practically divided the modern county between them, continued with little intermission till the present century, when the Earl of Sutherland acquired by purchase the Reay estates.

Both the Sutherlands and Mackays were distinguished from many of the other Highland clans by their general support, in the first instance, of the Royal Authority; after the Reformation of the Protestant interest; and after the Revolution of the Hanoverian succession. The first steps towards the comparatively early introduction of civilisation and order within certain limits in this remote part of the Highlands may be traced to the events above noticed, which took place during the reign of James IV., to the active aid given by Y. Mackay to the King, and the inclusion of the Sutherland estates for a brief space in the royal lands, and afterwards to the conduct of the earls of the Gordon line, who were loyal supporters of James IV. and his descendants.

It will help us to realise the condition of the Royal Exchequer and the mode of collecting the revenues if we follow the lives of a few of the principal officials who, during this period, rendered accounts to the Crown. Little has been hitherto known of Andrew Stewart, Bishop of Caithness, yet he was one of the chief revenue officers of James IV., and played an important part in the financial policy of the reign. His name will be sought in vain in general histories, and his life is dismissed with a few words even by ecclesiastical historians. Bishop Keith, whose account is fullest,[1] states that he was a natural son of the house of Innermeath, whose legitimation is to be found in public records. The same writer asserts that he was Bishop of Caithness in 1490; and Archbishop Spottiswoode dates his elevation to the See, which had been vacant since 1460, and administered by Mr Adam Gordon, apparently in 1484. But there is no record evidence that Andrew Stewart was Bishop prior to 13th March 1504, when he witnessed the marriage treaty of James and Margaret Tudor; and the terms of his obit in 1517, in the Calendar of Fearn, prove that 1503 was, in fact, the year of his consecration.[2] He had not then received the wealthy abbacies of Kelso or of Fearn in commendam, but apparently succeeded to the former in 1505,[3] and to the latter before 1512.[4] A grave charge is made in The History of the Earls of Ross, that he obtained the Abbey of Fearn by a false writ transmitted to Rome, which ousted Thomas M'Culloch, the prior incumbent.[5] On the death of Alexander Stewart, Archbishop of St Andrews, at [1] Catalogue of Bishops, p. 127. Keith unfortunately does not give the reference to the legitimation, which has not been traced. It appears, however, from the records of the Vatican that he had been appointed in 1501 (Maziere Brady's Catalogue of the Scottish and Irish Bishops). Lord Innermeath was Bailie of the Barony of Buchanan, and renders its account in 1508 (p. 145). He was son of Walter Lord Lyon, who exchanged the barony of Luss for Innermeath in the reign of James III., and may have been the father of the Bishop.

Flodden, it was proposed to translate Elphinstone to that See, and to make Andrew Stewart Bishop of Aberdeen, exempting his diocese from the jurisdiction of St Andrews;[1] but this project miscarried, and Andrew Foreman, Bishop of Moray, obtained the primacy. Besides his ecclesiastical preferments, Andrew Stewart was, from 1507 to 1513, Chamberlain of Ross and Ardmanach;[2] and when Sutherland fell into the King's Ward in 1510, by the non-entry of Earl John, he became Chamberlain of that Earldom.[3] He was in 1510 Chamberlain of Auchterhouse in Forfarshire,[4] Custumar of Edinburgh,[5] and also of all the parts north of the Spey.[6] In 1511 he became Lord High Treasurer[7] and Receiver-General of Customs.[8] He held for a time a lease of a considerable extent of lands in Galloway.[9] He was granted, on 26th October 1511, a lease for nine years of the whole lands of Ardmanach[10] on specially favourable terms in respect of his services, in particular the repairing of the Castles of Dingwall and Redcastle, "the putting and keeping of good rule in our said lands, danting of the wild people, and diverse other costs and charges,[11] and an annual payment of £3, 6s. 8d. from the ferms of Aberdeen.[1] Nor did he disdain minor and even petty transactions, for we find him leasing the demesne lands of Methven and two brewhouses at Idbyrne[2] in 1511. He frequently acted as Auditor of Exchequer[3] and as Commissioner for letting Crown Lands.[4] He was still Treasurer on 11th August 1512,[5] but was succeeded in that office by Cuthbert Baillie, Rector of Sanquhar, on 29th October 1512.[6] He acted as Controller for at least the year 1511–12, and rendered an account, unfortunately not extant, in this capacity for the term of Martinmas 1511 and Whitsunday 1512.[7]

He continued to be Chamberlain of Ross and Ardmanach down to 19th August 1516,[8] and to hold the two abbacies in Commendam until his death at his palace of Skibo, in Sutherland, on 17th June 1517.[9] It is not known that he fought, and it is an error that he fell at Flodden, perhaps through mistaking him for the Earl of Caithness in one of the lists of slain.[10] The enumeration of his various offices indicates that Andrew Stewart was one of the ecclesiastics whose plurality of civil as well as ecclesiastical offices was a sign of corruption in the Scottish Church, and a cause of weakness of the Scottish Government. We may read between the lines of the Exchequer Accounts something more of his character and conduct, and an illustration of the position to which the expenditure of the King was bringing the Royal Exchequer. We find him acting as Receiver-General of Customs in 1511, in succession to Thomas Dickson, who held the office in the previous year, with the result apparently of removing from the Controller's supervision the whole customs, as well as rents (when there was any balance), of the Burghs ; and in 1512 he also received the sum due by the Ballivi ad extrâ under the same new title of Receiver-General. In 1513 James Redheuch again appears as Rotulator or Controller, and the payments are made to him. The probable inference is that a change had been made in 1511, not only in the officer who was the chief accountant, but in his title, and when it is added that no account is extant of the manner in which he discharged himself of the revenues so received, it seems further possible that an attempt had been made to introduce a new financial administration at the suggestion and under the control of Andrew Stewart, which had not proved a successful experiment. This conjecture is confirmed by certain entries in the Ettrick Accounts which show that Andrew Stewart had been raising a loan for the King,[1] and by the singular record of the close of his stewardship in the succeeding reign, which is contained in the Exchequer Rolls for 1516. He had been largely in arrear in his accounts for the years 1513, 1514, and 1515. In the last of these years his arrears for Ross[1] had amounted to £254, 5s. 4d., besides considerable quantities of grain, oatmeal, and cattle, and for Ardmanach[2] to £307, 13s., besides grain and cattle. At the audit of 1516 he represented to the auditors that his expenses in the maintenance of the Castles of Dingwall and Redcastle and their garrisons "against the men of the Isles and other evil-disposed persons," and the purchase of artillery and ammunition had more than swallowed up all his receipts, and accordingly he persuaded the Auditors to wipe off the whole arrears.[3] But that they did not give implicit credit to his representations is perhaps indicated by the memorandum that he was to be bound to account for the whole revenues of 1516, without any deduction, and to give up an inventory of the artillery he had purchased, which was to be inscribed on the back of the Roll, where, however, it does not appear. His accounts for 1516, rendered at the same time, however, also fell short, and Albany, the Regent, had to consent to his discharge on payment of a composition of £500 in place of a sum of £185, 13s. 6d. due for Ross and £118, 1s. 10d. due for Ardmanach, besides the large grain and cattle rents.[1] His account as Treasurer also closes in October 1512, with the singular and suspicious entry that the amount was fixed "ad aestimationem," according to an estimate, an expression which has not been elsewhere observed, and even this estimate is only arrived at by his taking credit for a payment of £3333, 6s. 8d. to the King, an equally singular entry which does not occur in the account of any other Treasurer.

With all his offices, ecclesiastical and civil, it would appear that this grasping prelate died bankrupt, or at least had to make a composition with his Royal creditor.

Andrew Foreman, Bishop of Moray during the period of the present Accounts, was not so great a revenue officer as his brother of Caithness, but his influence with James was greater, and continued longer. He is a well-known character in Scottish history. It has been common indeed to ascribe, perhaps too exclusively, to his influence the renewal of the French League and the final breach with England; but he was undoubtedly one, perhaps the chief, promoter of the war with England. He was,

[1] It is perhaps worth while to state the arrears of produce, though it is difficult to convert them so as to estimate the exact deficiency. The Ross arrears were 47 chalders 14 bolls barley, 35 chalders 12 bolls oatmeal, 12 bolls 8 chalders oats, 45 marts, and 20 sheep. The Ardmanach arrears were 21 chalders 10 bolls barley, 2 chalders oatmeal, 18 marts, and 1 quarter 4 lasts of salmon. The conclusion of the account is significant. after the death of Robert Blackader, the leading diplomatist of the Scottish Court, the counterpart to Wolsey in that of England. A cadet of the family of Foreman of Hutton in Haddingtonshire, he appears throughout these Rolls as lessee of the Granges of Dunbar, let to him by a lease in 1503 for nine years,[1] at a rent of 30 chalders wheat, the same of barley, and 300 rabbits, with the obligation to maintain a garrison of 12 men in the castle; and as Chamberlain of the Earldom of Moray from 11th August 1507 to 19th July 1509, when he was succeeded by Robert Rankine, vicar of Inverness. He also frequently acted as Auditor,[2] and was Custumar and Lessee of the Customs of Moray.[3] The earlier history of this able and ambitious prelate, who was Commendator of Pittenweem and Dryburgh, and of Cottingham, in England, and, at a later period, of Dunfermline, besides holding the Bishopric of Moray, has been traced in the Preface to the Treasurer's Accounts.[4] After the death of Alexander Stewart he reached the top of the ecclesiastical ladder, which he had been climbing all his life, and became Archbishop of St Andrews. The present notice is confined to his career in the period of the present volume, during which the steps of his public service are marked by equal steps in his personal aggrandisement. As was usual, he did not forget his kinsmen, and one of his brothers was Dean, another relative Precentor of Glasgow, while his elder brother John was the King's First Porter. Foreman's frequent absences as ambassador did not prevent him from engaging in profitable transactions in Scotland, and we find him occupying the lands of Logyhauch as a steelbow tenant, and farming the fishings of the Findhorn at Darnaway.

On 30th July 1509 Foreman was sent by James to congratulate Henry VIII. on his accession, and to request delivery of the jewels left to Margaret, but he did not succeed so well with that monarch as with his father, who had conferred on him the Priory of Cottingham.[1] It is not improbable that the failure to reward him may have made him an enemy of England. In the following year he was despatched on an embassy to Rome, which James had already contemplated in 1508.[2] This embassy, like that in the discharge of which Blackader had died, had a twofold object to arrange for James personally—the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, upon which his heart was set, and to promote the peace of the Christian princes of Europe, so as to leave him free to fight the infidel Turk, the favourite project of Julius II. Foreman had obtained a licence, dated 15th October 1509, under the Privy Seal, to obtain from the Pope any Archbishopric, Bishopric, or Prelacy about to become vacant for himself, and any benefice for his relative, John Foreman, the Precentor of Glasgow,[1] and James wrote letters recommending him, in the strongest terms, to the College of Cardinals [2] and the Marquis of Mantua,[3] describing him as "a man skilled by experience in the affairs of the Scottish Kingdom, and who had conducted successfully all his former embassies."[4]

Instead of going direct to Rome, Foreman went to the Court of Louis XII. to try to reconcile that monarch and the Pope, and on 16th February 1511 James writes to Julius that he had heard from Foreman that he was staying a considerable time in France with the hope of persuading Louis to make peace, but on 31st March James informs the Pope [5] that Foreman had returned by way of England, and gives an account of his mission, which had failed to reconcile [6] Louis to the Holy See, and that he had determined once more to exhort and admonish Louis of the necessity for peace, to restore Bologna and Ferrara, and dismiss the Council of Pisa. He thanks Julius for the favourable reception of Foreman, for the privileges granted to the Chapel Royal, and for the absolution (lavacrum conscientiæ nostræ)[1] granted to himself. It must have been during this journey that he went to Rome, and the scene occurred of which Pitscottie, after his manner, gives so ludicrous an account, when the Bishop's Latin grace, not being understood by the Italians, he concluded it with saying in good Scottish—"The Deil I gie ye to all false carles in Nomine Patris Filii et Spiritus Sancti,"[2] at which, when explained, the Pope laughed amongst the rest. Foreman had made a favourable impression on Julius II., who wrote to James that he would be included in the next nomination of Cardinals, but the promise wasnot fulfilled.[3]

Early next year Foreman was sent back to France,[4] and James informed Julius that he was detained there in February 1512, promoting the interests of the Pope, whom he reminds of the promise he had made to create him a Cardinal. He remained in France till after the Battle of Flodden, and his services commended themselves so much to the French King that he procured, notwithstanding much opposition, his election to the Bishopric of Bourges. Anne of Brittany interested herself personally on his behalf, and Foreman in return transmitted her letter and a turquoise ring to James, adding his own urgent counsel to aid the French by invading England. A letter of Louis to the Chapter of Bourges leaves no doubt what those services were. He had failed to reconcile the Pope and the French King. He succeeded in persuading his own sovereign to take the step for which he had been long preparing, and to declare war with England. "Dear and well beloved," writes Louis on 7th August 1513 to the Chapter, "we have already written our wish and desire that our very dear and great friend the reverend father. Bishop of Moray, ambassador of our very dear and beloved brother, cousin, and good ally, the King of Scots, should be and remain your archbishop and peaceable pastor. . . . . And that you may understand better the obligation we are under to the King of Scotland and the Bishop of Moray, by whose means and the good offices with that King, the King of Scotland has openly declared his wish to be of our party and to make war against our ancient enemy of England, we send . . . . the double of the letters the King of Scotland has written to us, and the defiance he has made to the King of England." The Canons of Bourges still refused to elect Foreman, notwithstanding a Bull he had procured from Leo x., but Louis insisted, and at last, on 1st October, he was postulated to the See, three Canons dissenting. On the 13th he made his solemn entry into Bourges. He obtained for his countrymen a general Act of Naturalisation, exemption from the droit d'aubain,[1] and the right to hold benefices in France. But these favours were a poor compensation for the lives lost at Flodden.

James Beaton, another of the great prelates of this period, was the first of three members of the same family whose destiny it was to play a conspicuous part in the government of the Scottish Church during the sixteenth century. The sixth son of James Beaton or Bethune of Balfour, in Fife, he was the uncle of David the Cardinal, who in his turn was uncle of James, Archbishop of Glasgow, a nepotic succession, though not in the worst sense of that term. One of his elder brothers, Robert, was Abbot of Cupar, Melrose, and Glenburn; another, Henry, held the wealthy Priory of St Andrews. James Beaton himself became Chantor of Dornoch in 1497, Provost of Bothwell 1503, Prior of Whithern, and Abbot of Dunfermline 1504, and held in commendam two other abbacies, Kilwinning and Arbroath. He was elected to the See of Galloway in 1508, but almost immediately promoted to the Archbishopric of Glasgow in 1509. He exchanged this See for the Primacy of St Andrews on Foreman's death in 1522, and held it till his death in 1539. His ecclesiastical preferments present, like those of Foreman, a telling picture of the pluralities in the Scottish Church. But even these rich benefices were not enough for the insatiable avarice of the dignified churchman of these days, and the Exchequer Rolls enable us to complete the tale. In these we find Beaton Chamberlain of Fife and Keeper of Falkland Palace, Lord High Treasurer from 1505 to 1509, and Auditor in several audits.

The most important part of his life belongs to the next reign, during which he continued Foreman's policy of the French alliance, and paved the way for the Reformation with the blood of the first martyrs. The chief importance of Beaton as an officer of revenue was due to his having the administration of the King's lands in Fife. His Fife origin designated him for this office as well as for the Abbacy of Dunfermline. His fee as Chamberlain of Fife and Custodier of Falkland Palace was not large, only £20, but he received extra payments for the collection of grassums.[1] The influence which he derived from this office must have been great, and we find him, along with the Bishop of Caithness, actively concerned in the conversion of the Fife tenants into feuars in 1509, and the subsequent years. His Keepership of Falkland brought him into frequent contact with the King, and he did not fail to use this to obtain promotion for his relations and dependants in a manner which raised the remonstrances of the young Archbishop of St Andrews and Patrick Panther, the King's Secretary, himself a candidate for ecclesiastical preferment.[2]

In tracing the outlines of the lives of such representative churchmen we must not forget the noble contrast of the good Bishop of Aberdeen, William Elphinston, the wise counsellor, the patron of learning, and pious founder of its Royal College.

But it is significant that he only appears in these accounts as an Auditor and Keeper of the Privy Seal, and a recipient of certain payments for the University.[1] No part of the administration of the royal revenues, except as Auditor,[2] and no portion of the spoils of the Exchequer, fell to his share.

Alexander, third Lord Hume, and Henry, first Lord Sinclair, may serve as examples of the lay officers of James in the administration of the revenue. They bring us in contact with two extremities of the kingdom, the southern Borders and the northern islands of Orkney and Shetland. Neither of them, though they stood amongst the chief barons of the reign, accumulated so many offices as the Prelates. The Church was then the shortest and surest road to the greatest wealth, as well as to the highest honours. On the accession of James, Alexander, the Master of Hume, afterwards second Lord Hume, had been created for life Great Chamberlain of Scotland,[3] an office he retained till his death in 1506. The Rolls corroborate the other evidence, which proves that he was succeeded in that year by Alexander, third Lord Hume, who was served heir to his father 21st October 1506,[4] and correct the error of Crawford,[5] who suppresses the third lord, and supposes his father survived till 1516. The present volume further shows that the third lord also succeeded to the office of Great Chamberlain.[1] Before his father's death he had been Cupbearer to the King[2] and Keeper of the Castle of Newark,[3] and on 31st December 1505 he had been appointed Chamberlain of the Barony of Haliburton, in Angus, which had fallen to the King in ward owing to the death of Patrick, Lord Haliburton.[4] He succeeded his father as Receiver of the Earldom of March and Lordship of Ettrick Forest,[5] and as Warden of the Middle and East Marches,[6] and held all these offices till the conclusion of the reign. But he was not so powerful as his father, who is described, with some exaggeration, as Prime Minister of James IV. James was his own Prime Minister, and allowed no one to share his power; but he did not forget that he owed his throne to Lord Bothwell and Lord Hume, who were no doubt the most trusted lay counsellors of the first years of his reign. The younger Hume after his father's death retained his office of Royal Cupbearer,[7] and this office, as well as the Great Chamberlainship, must have brought him constantly to Court. It was by paying liberally the head of this great Border house, while retaining many of the Border lands and Castles in his own hands, that James secured their fidelity. Hume, in addition to a fee of £200 a year as Warden, £40 as Cupbearer, £50 as Receiver of Ettrick, £10 as Receiver of March, and £2 as Chamberlain of Haliburton, or £302 in all, had his salary and dues as Great Chamberlain, though their amount does not appear in the Rolls.

The part taken by Hume in the campaign of Flodden was not fortunate. The Ill Raid precipitated the attack on England, and was defeated by Bulmer. In the battle itself Hume commanded the left wing along with Huntly, which at first was successful in an engagement with Sir Edward Howard the Admiral, but was subsequently routed by the cavalry under Lord Dacre, who slew his kinsmen Sir John Hume, Cuthbert heir of Sir David Hume of Fastcastle, and many of their friends. Hume himself escaped across the Border. There is no reason to credit, however, the stories reported by Pitscottie, that Hume played the traitor, or that he was the cause of the loss of the battle, or of the death of James IV. These were unfounded rumours, due probably, in the first place, to the desire after the defeat to find a scapegoat, and afterwards to his taking the English side in the commencement of the new reign against Albany, and the party who supported the French alliance. But this portion of his life, and his execution along with his brother in 1516, lie beyond the period of the present volume.

Henry, Lord Sinclair, was grandson of the Chancellor of James II., William Sinclair, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, by his eldest son William, who, for some reason not clearly explained, was disinherited, did not succeed his father either in the Earldom of Caithness or in the Barony of Roslin, which passed to two sons of a second marriage, William, Earl of Caithness, and Sir Oliver Sinclair of Roslin. William succeeded, however, to the lands of Cousland in Lothian and Dysart and Ravenscraig in Fife, which had been obtained by the Chancellor in exchange for the lands of Orkney in 1471.[1] His mother was Elizabeth, daughter of George, Earl of Rothes. His grandfather died in 1479–80, and his father before 1489. By a charter in that year he was created Lord Sinclair, and declared chief of the blood and heir of his grandfather, William, Earl of Caithness, but his uncle retained that Earldom, though his title to it was disputed. He had taken the King's side in his contest with his father, and throughout the whole reign was one of James IV.'s intimate friends. He fell with the King at Flodden. After their acquisition by the Crown, the lands of Orkney and Shetland were administered by a royal lessee, usually the Bishop; but in 1488 Henry Sinclair appears as Intromitter[2] with their revenues, and in the same year received a lease, for he accounts as lessee in the Rolls of 1489, and all subsequent to that date.[1] The money rent in the lease was £120, and the victual rents were commuted at £366, 13s. 4d., in all £486, 13s. 4d. This beneficial lease was evidently a form in which the lands of the Earldom of Orkney and Shetland were restored to the head of the Sinclairs, but without granting the absolute property or the title. The Crown was still indisposed to create independent Earls, and there was no Earl of Orkney till James VI. bestowed the title on Robert Stuart, Prior of Holyrood, though Bothwell for a short time bore the title of Duke under Queen Mary's grant. A series of charters prove the favour in which Henry Sinclair was held by the King. On his marriage with Margaret Hepburn, the daughter of Patrick, Lord Bothwell, he was confirmed in the lands of Cousland (afterwards sold to Lord Ruthven[2]) and Ravenscraig.[3] In the same year he had a lease of Orkney and Shetland for 13 years at 570 merks,[4] the custody of Kirkwall Castle, and the offices of Justiciar Fowd and Bailie.[5] In 1501 he had a lease for 19 years of Orkney and Shetland at 650 merks.[6] In 1509 he received a new grant of the Barony of Newburgh in Aberdeenshire, which had fallen into the King's hands by recognition,[7] with a licence to infeft vassals. On 13th March 1510 he was created Master of Artillery,[1] with a fee of £100 a year, which he was allowed to deduct from his Orkney accounts.[2] His chief residence was in the Castle of Ravenscraig, between Kirkcaldy and Dysart, one of the best specimens of the architecture of the 16th century, which had been built by Mary of Guelders,[3] and the administration of Orkney and Shetland was probably carried on by deputies. His account for these lands is one of the simplest of the Rolls, consisting merely of debiting himself with the stipulated rent and taking credit for the rental of the Island of Borra (Burray), which James created into a Regality in favour of the See of Orkney, and for a few payments in the King's account, chiefly the price of hawks sent from the islands for the royal sport.[4] The Sinclairs ceased to have any connection with the Orkneys after the death of Sir Oliver Sinclair of Roslin, the ill-fated commander at Solway Moss. But this early link between Fife and the Orkneys, due partly to their both being so accessible by sea, was probably not without effect in later history, and may have led to the settlement of several Fife families in them. The adherence of the Sinclairs, the chief family in Caithness, to the King had a similar effect to that of the Gordons in Aberdeenshire and the Sutherlands and Mackays in Sutherland. The Northern and Eastern Highlands, with the adjacent islands, were comparatively free from the troubles which disturbed the Western Highlands and Isles during this reign, and notwithstanding James's successful expeditions did not finally cease till after the Union.

There is less in these accounts than might be anticipated to illustrate the approach of the fatal campaign of Flodden. Still a few particulars may be gleaned. We observe Montjoie, the French herald, passing through Scotland to the Danish Court to secure the aid of King Hans;[1] De la Motte,[2] the French ambassador, coming to Ayr to avoid the English coast; and a Groom of the Chamber (Le Verlot Camere)[3] returning to France before 12th July 1513, no doubt the bearer of James's final resolution. His name has not been traced, but he can scarcely have been an envoy of low rank, as he received a pipe of wine of the value of £5 for his use on the passage. We also come across a casual reference to Octavian,[4] called the Pope's servitor, whom we know from other sources to be Octavian Olarius,[5] an envoy more than once sent to Scotland by Julius II. We see the woods of Darnaway being felled for building ships at Leith, and note the acquisition from the Abbot of Holyrood of lands for the new Port of Leith, now Newhaven, where James had his principal shipyards and docks, as well as the artillery being made in the works of Robert Borthwick at Dieppe.[1] Towards the close of the accounts we notice Sir Alexander Lauder, the Provost of Edinburgh, as well as George Halkerston, his fellow-custumar, disbursing large sums from the customs for supplies of corn, wine, and spices to victual the fleet,[2] and Henry Sinclair[3] sending salt beef and pork from Orkney for the same purpose.

It is to be regretted that no accounts of the military expenditure of Scotland at this period have been preserved in the Public Records,[4] and we cannot but suspect that some of the expenditure which went for purposes of war are hidden under other entries in a way not unknown even now in some public accounts. We are able, however, to supply from the Exchequer Rolls and other sources a brief and imperfect sketch of the rise and progress of the artillery and the navy, the two new branches of the military service, and to form some idea of what was meant by the feudal array of Scotland when a muster of the whole kingdom was summoned, as it was by James for this campaign.

[4] Pinkerton refers (vol. i. p. 510) to Accounts of the Army and Household Expense (1511) as in the charge of the Messrs Robertson amongst the Exchequer Records; but these Records had not then been carefully examined, and there are no such accounts in the Exchequer Rolls relative to the army. Some separate sheets of Treasurer's Accounts for 1512 give details as to the cost of building ships and making guns, but these will naturally be published in whole or in abstract with the Treasurer's Accounts for that year. The notice of the Household Accounts, formerly given, shows that the statement with reference to them is erroneous, unless the fragment of the Household Book of 1512 is intended.

The period of these Accounts was distinguished by a signal advance both in the artillery and the navy. Siege engines and naval battles were known in ancient and early mediæval wars. The so-called "Greek Fire" had been used as early as the ninth century by the Emperors of the East against the Saracens, but the art of making it was lost with their empire. The invention of gunpowder, at least two centuries before the sixteenth, had kindled the spark which was to revolutionise the art of war. But the end of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth century is the epoch when warfare definitely became a matter of machines as well as of men, conducted at a greater cost of money and of blood. The nations of the Continent were busily occupied with the new style of fortifications and new methods of attack. By a singular union of talent the great artists were then the great military engineers. Artillery, according to the probable derivation, is derived from art.[1] Leonardo da Vinci wrote on the subject in Italy; Albert Durer a little later in Germany. The Italians, French, and Flemings were special masters of the art of gunnery. The active monarch of Scotland did not fail to take notice of and use their inventions. His taste for single combat and the tournament did not appease, but rather whetted, his appetite for war on a larger scale. The inventor and the amateur are always eager to try experiments. The "battering at the study," or smithy, which Dunbar refers to as a favourite exercise of James, was very probably connected with the art of gunnery. James had also an urgent political motive. Both the artillery and the navy, owing to the greater expenditure and organisation which they entailed, fell into the hands of the King and increased his military power. They reduced the power of the Barons, rendered the chivalry of the Knights obsolete, and had a direct influence on the overthrow of the feudal military system. In both these branches there had been tentative experiments, but James IV. was the creator of the first, it may almost be said the only, regular royal artillery and navy of Scotland. He must not be deprived of this credit, though the result was a disastrous failure.

By an Act of James II.[1] it had been declared that "the King mak request to certaine of the great Baronis of the land that ar of ony might to mak carts of weir and ilk cart twa gunnys and in ilk ane of them to have twa chæwmis with the remanent of the graith that effeiris thereto and ane cunnande man to schoit thame and gif they haif na craft in the schoiting of thame as now they may learn or the time cum that will be needful to haif thame." The language of this Act speaks plainly of the infancy of artillery. Yet this was not its first introduction. Barbour, writing before 1395, refers to guns as known in his time, though unknown to Bruce :—

> "But gynnis for crakys had he nane,
> For in Scotland yet but wene (seldom)
> The use of thaim had nocht been sene."[1]

In 1430 James I. had imported from Flanders the Lion, which Hector Boece describes as "Immanem fundam bombardicam aeris metallo fabricatam."[2] Mention is made in the Exchequer Rolls of a great bombard in 1442 and 1450, which was at the siege of Hatton in 1452 and of Abercorn in 1456, where it was managed by a French gunner who never missed his mark. At the siege of Threave, 1455–6, there were bombards, one of which may have been Mons Meg. Allan Panther, the most ingenious man in Scotland, lost his life by mishandling a cannon in 1455. James II. was killed by the bursting of a bombard at Roxburgh in 1460. There are further notices of "the great gun" in the Exchequer Rolls of 1456 and 1463. But the first mention of Mons by name is in the Treasurer's Accounts of 1489, which shows she was taken to the siege of Dumbarton, and treated with the honours bestowed on novelties. Canvas was painted for her clothes, the minstrels played before her as she was taken down the gate or road from the Castle of Edinburgh, her wheels were provided from the alder woods of Ironside in Fife, and a new cradle made for her as she lay at St Leonards. Her subsequent history, and the part she took in the siege of Norham in 1497, when Sir Robert Ker, Master of the Artillery, hired one hundred men and five carpenters and smiths for her transport, are traced in the Preface to the Treasurer's Accounts.[1] Certainly of foreign workmanship, Mons was probably called after the town of that name in the Low Country. The captains, as well as the makers of the Scotch early ordnance, were foreigners—Frenchmen, Flemings, or Germans. Hans, probably a Fleming, the first Master Gunner of James IV., had a long conference with the King at Hume Castle in 1497.[2] But a native Scotchman, Sir John Sandilands, Laird of Hillhouse, appears as Commander of the Artillery earlier in the reign in connection with the sieges of Duchal, Crookston, and Dumbarton,[3] and he was also present at the raid of Ellem in 1496. The guns used at that time are described as "ii great Curtaldes, x Falcons or Littel Serpentyns, xxi Cart Gunnys of Weir with Chawmis, and xvi clos cartis for Speirs, Powdir, Stanis, and odir stuf to thir gunnis longin."[1] In the Accounts of the Controller for 1499 there is an allowance of £3, 3s. for the instruments of siege called trebuchets then delivered to the Master of Artillery.[2] Sandilands is last mentioned as one of the embassy to London relative to the marriage of James in 1501, but before that date two holders of the office appear in the Accounts. The Laird of Balguy in 1496,[3] and Sir Robert Ker in 1497.[4] Ker's fee appears to have been £80,[5] but in none of the notices does he receive the title of Master of Artillery, as he does in the Treasurer's Accounts.[6] The present Accounts contain the warrant, dated 15th March 1513, appointing one of their successors, Lord Sinclair, "Master of all our Machines and Artyllerie,"[7] with a fee of £100

[1] The "Curtaldi" was a short gun from French Court; the "Falcon," a cannon of 3 inches calibre, with smaller sizes known as half and quarter falcons; the "Serpentyn" was also of small size; the "Cart Gunnys of War" were the twin or double guns described in the Act 1456, c. 4, and supposed by Grose, Military Antiquities, ii., to be a Scottish invention. The "Trebuchet" was a machine for throwing stones, of which various figures are given by Grose. The monster guns or bombards, of which Mons Meg was a specimen, were found too unwieldy, and gradually gave place to smaller guns. On this subject, The Complaynt of Scotland, Dr J. H. Murray's edition, may be referred to; also Lord High Treasurer's Accounts, 1 Pref. ccxvii.; Meyrick, Ancient Armour, ii. p. 289; Grose, Military Antiquities, ii.; Monteil, Histoire des Français, ii. p. 365. It is significant that the names of those early guns were chiefly taken from birds or beasts of prey.

a year.[1] He was to have meat and drink for himself and eight persons in the King's Hall, and "all other privileges the Masters of Artyllerie had enjoyed in the past," proving that he had more than one predecessor in the office.[2]

Other references to the artillery occur in the Accounts at the commencement of the next reign. The Bishop of Caithness had fortified the Castles of Dingwall and Redcastle against the Western Islanders, and was allowed credit in 1516 for the purchase of "the machines called serpentynis, hackbuttis, culveringis, as well as the powderis called le gunpowderis."[3] In each of these castles "there was a 'machinator'" or mechanic, though whether for the casting or repair only of the guns is not certain. Eighteen of the machines called serpentynis were sold by Lord Sinclair to James IV., and their price, £100, was paid to his widow in 1514,[4] but where Sinclair got the guns we are not told. A Scotchman, however, appears in the present Accounts, Robert Borthwick, who was undoubtedly a maker of great guns, probably the first in Britain.[5] He received in 1512 one hundred French scuta,[6] of the value of £95, 10s., from the King, no doubt for guns supplied, and appears to have been then resident at Dieppe. But he had also a grant in feu of the half Mains of Ballencrief, and shortly after returned to Scotland, where he set up a work in Edinburgh Castle. His guns were inscribed with the lines—

> "Machina sum Scoto, which Lesley translates—

> "Scot, Robert Borthwick tower and toun, > Made me a cannon to ding doun."[1]

The price of a great rope for drawing the machines and bombards from Edinburgh Castle to the Camp was paid to Janet Paterson, the widow of Provost Lauder, in 1514;[2] and Margaret Crichton, the widow of George Halkerstone, an Edinburgh burgess, received in 1515 £11, 4s., for a payment which Allan Cochrane had made to four engineers and two carpenters, Frenchmen.[3] So late as the Fife Accounts of 1518 we find a payment for 16 oxen which had been employed in drawing the artillery to Norham and Flodden, and had been killed there, at the rate of 2½ merks per ox.

Borthwick was present with the artillery at Flodden, when James, with the foolhardiness of his character, refused, according to Pitscottie, to allow him to fire, saying, that he would hang him if he shot that day, for he was determined "to have all his force before him on a plain field and see what they can do." The English chronicler, Hall, on the contrary, reports that the Scottish artillery engaged :—"Then outburst the ordnance on both sides with fire, flame, and hideous noise; and the Master Gunner of the English slew the Master Gunner of Scotland, and beat all his men from their ordnance, so that the Scottish ordnance did no harm to the Englishmen, but the Englishmen's artillery shot into the midst of the King's battle, and slew many."[1] Lesley so far corroborates Hall, saying, the Scottish guns fired, but too high, so that they hit no one. Borthwick's wages, which appear in the Accounts for 1514 and 1515,[2] and a confirmation charter by James v., dated 23rd July 1516, of the lands of Ballencrief, in favour of Robert Borthwick, who had not, it is said, been infeft by his royal father,[3] prove that the Master Gunner slain cannot have been Borthwick, and casts some doubt on Hall's usually correct narrative. Possibly the reference is to Lord Sinclair who was slain at Flodden. The whole Scottish artillery fell to the conqueror, and was taken partly to Etal partly to Berwick, where, Pitscottie says, some of it was still to be seen when he wrote. In 1539, when the custody of Berwick was given over by Sir Thomas Clifford to his successor as captain, there are entries of cannon "of Scottyish makying" in the inventory of its stores. It is described by Ruthal, Bishop of Durham, as "the fairest and best that lately hath been seen." The account in French of the battle, sent by Surrey to Henry VIII., describes the artillery in equally laudatory terms. It numbered in all 17 great pieces—5 great curtaldis, 2 culveringis, 4 sacres of the same size which had been on board ship called "The Rose Galley," and 6 larger serpentynes than any in England. These were six, no doubt, of the Seven Sisters, the masterpieces of Borthwick. This brief chapter of the history of Scottish artillery proves how eager the Scottish kings were to improve themselves in that scientific branch of the art of war. To obtain its aid against their unruly Barons was more important to them than for any of the Monarchs of Europe, for they had no standing army, nor till James V. a proper Body-Guard.

There seems little doubt it was of superior calibre to the early English artillery, though perhaps the guns were not so numerous. The reason is supplied by some curious passages in the letters of Spinelly, the English representative in Flanders to Henry VIII. It appears that the English and Scotch Kings were actively competing in 1510 for guns which were being made by Hans, the Flemish gunsmith; and in February, Spinelly notes that he has made an agreement on Henry's behalf for guns "better cheap than the King of Scots can have by 16 pietas on 100."[1] The best paymaster generally gets the best articles.

[1] Spinelly to Henry VIII., Papers of Henry VIII., i., Record Series, Nos. 216, 922, 923. No. 3616 gives a list of Henry's purchases of guns from Hans Popinmyter at Mechlin.

Naval architecture also took a fresh start about the same period. The use of naval artillery indeed necessitated a new style of ship. The old galleys, the descendants of the Classic trireme and the Norse long-boat had long become antiquated. Even the barges and balingars of the 14th and 15th centuries were inadequate. Vessels were required which could carry guns on their forecastles and resist shot by their thick sides. The picture of "The Great Harry" and its comrades brings vividly before us the new style, which supplanted the old much as the iron clad ships of our own time have supplanted the wooden walls of England in which Nelson won his battles.

Robert Bruce has been called the father of the Scottish, as Alfred of the English Navy, though his predecessors, the neighbours and rivals of the Norse kings, knew the use of galleys, at least for defensive war.[1] But Bruce first foresaw the great importance of a navy to a small country with so large a sea-board, and his last years were spent in experiments of shipbuilding at Cardross.[2] Like James IV., he built a great ship, which seems never to have left the Clyde.[3] The active war-service of Scottish vessels dates, however, from the latter half of the fifteenth century, and was due to private enterprise rather than to the royal initiative. The King, like other persons, had single ships of his own for trade and transit; and the service due by certain vassals on the north and west coasts and the isles to furnish galleys was confirmed and enlarged by a statute of James I.[1] But the next great experiment was made, not by the King, but by the Bishop of St Andrews, Kennedy, whose barge, the "St Salvator" was the wonder of his day, though its lavish cost did not save it from being stranded on the Northumberland sands. No admiral of Scotland is mentioned on record until George Crichton of Cairns, Earl of Caithness, who held the office at least from 1449 to 1453 under James II. In the following reign Alexander, Duke of Albany, brother of James III., was Great Admiral of Scotland from 1475 to 1483; and in his agreement with James III. in 1482 he undertook to execute loyally his office of Warden and Admiral within the bounds of the same.[2] James IV. granted the office for life to Patrick Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, in 1488, with the power of appointing deputies, and he was succeeded in it by his son Adam, Earl of Bothwell.[3] They were probably titular officers, who knew as little of the sea or ships as the First Lord of the Admiralty, with the possible exception of the Earl of Caithness. The real founders of the Scottish Navy were the merchant skippers of Leith, whose names frequently occur in the present accounts,—Andrew Wood, the Bartons, and another mariner often mentioned, though less famous, William Brounhill. The statutes[1] requiring all burghs to keep "Busches of 20 tons" to be manned by "idle, able-bodied men," had fishing chiefly in view, but also the training of sailors. Wood of Largo, who is to be distinguished from another Andrew Wood, the King's usher and feuar of the Thanage of Fettercairn, appears in these Rolls as constantly engaged in carrying grain from Largo to Leith,[2] and the recipient of a fee of £20 a year.[3] The Great Seal Register marks his gradual rise. A native of Leith, in the service of James III., he obtained in 1483 a grant for nineteen years of the lands of Largo for "his gratuitous service by land and sea, specially against the English enemies, to the danger of his life."[4] The lease was converted into a feu farm in 1487,[5] and confirmed by James IV. as soon as he succeeded.[6] In 1491 the Cotland and Mill land[7] were added, and leave given him to erect a tower on the narrative that he had already begun to build a fortalice and certain houses by the hands of his English captives.[8] In 1504 his grant of Largo was again confirmed and exempted from certain decrees issued against feus in Fife[1] on a special narrative of his success in holding Dunbar against the English. In the following year he acquired other lands, both in Forfar and in Fife.[2] It was one of the last acts of James before starting on the campaign of Flodden, to grant a new charter of resignation incorporating his estates in the barony of Largo, and creating the Nether town and Sey town of Largo into a Burgh of Barony.[3] The reddendo for Largo was £20, besides grain, and that for the lands of Fairfields and Frostleyis was that he should take the King and Queen to the Isle of May when required.

The two famous victories in 1489 and 1504 which he won over the English with the "Flower" and the "Yellow Carvel," as a reward for which he received these grants and honours, are familiar incidents in Scottish history. When the "Great St Michael" was built in 1511 he was appointed Quartermaster, and Pitscottie claims him and Robert, one of the sons of John Barton, her Skipper, as his authorities for the account he gives of her dimensions—240 by 36 feet, and 10 feet of side wall; her crew of 1000 seamen and 120 gunners, besides officers; and her cost £30,000, apart from her artillery.[4] This was three times

[4] Pitscottie describes her artillery as consisting of "many cannons, six on every side, with three great bassils, two behind in her dock, and one before, with three hundred shot of small artillery; that is to say, myand and battert falcon and quarter falcons slings, pestilent serpentines and double dogs, with hagtor and culvering, cross-bows and hand-bows."

the cost of Bishop Kennedy's barge, the "St Salvator," and there seems no reason to doubt the "St Michael" was the largest vessel up to that time launched in Scotland. Wood is often popularly styled Admiral, but that rank is not mentioned in the Accounts, where he is designated as Knight. Pitscottie calls him only Quartermaster, although he mentions that he was sent to supersede Arran when that insubordinate commander disobeyed orders and carried the Scottish fleet to Ireland instead of to France.

More celebrated even than Wood was the family of the Bertons or Bartons. Its founder was John, the merchant trader of Leith, who, in the reign of James III., commanded the "Yellow Carvel," described as the King's ship, which was taken by the English, but restored by Edward IV. His life has been traced in the Preface to the Treasurer's Accounts.[1] He had three sons—Andrew, Robert, and John—the two former of whom appear in the present Accounts. John, the father, is last mentioned in the Exchequer Rolls in 1507.[2] Andrew first appears in the Treasurer's Accounts for 1497, when he and his brother Robert took charge of the passage of Perkin Warbeck from Ayr to Ireland, Andrew being paid for the victualling, Robert for the crew of his ship "The Cuckoo."[3] In the Exchequer Rolls the notices of him refer almost exclusively to the remission of customs in his favour,[1] which prove that he continued to be employed in the King's service. They confirm the date of his death in the celebrated engagement with Sir Edward Howard in the Downs, for he is described as dead in the account from 21st August 1511 to 3rd January 1512, rendered by the Bishop of Caithness, as Custumar of Edinburgh, in July 1512.[2] The battle was fought on 2nd August 1511, and his ship, "The Lion," and its companion the "Jenny Pirwin," transferred to the English navy. His exploits against the Portuguese, in reprisal for their seizure, thirty years before, of a ship of his father's under letters of marque, granted in 1506, against the Flemish pirates, and the part he took in the service of Hans of Denmark against Lubeck in 1508, have often been related. A later passage in the history of the Bartons, which has escaped the notice of historians, appears in the Letter Book of King Hans in the Danish Archives. In 1509–10 Robert Barton had been in the employment of the Danish King, and on 4th September 1510 he returned to Scotland with letters to James containing an urgent request for further aid in ships and men—"Armatorum et navium maximo quo potuit numero nobis subveniat fraterne optamus"—and, if possible, from the French King as well as himself.[3] Barton received also a testimonial in his own favour. In 1511 another letter expressly requested that Andrew Barton should be sent to Copenhagen with as many ships as possible—in any case, with his own ship.[1] Andrew Barton accordingly was sent in the beginning of the year with his own ship, probably "The Lion," and a smaller vessel, probably the "Jenny Pirwin," as Hans believed, as a present from James. Some quarrel ensued, for we learn these facts from a letter of Hans to Henry VIII. of 12th February 1512, when he had heard of Barton's defeat and the capture of his ships, requesting that the one intended for himself should be released and sent to Denmark.[2] It was a request little likely to be granted, but Henry's answer is not known. This incident is very significant of the fact that there was a want of clearness in the distinction between the King's ships and those of the mariners employed in his service. It is not impossible that the "Jenny Pirwin" may have been Barton's own ship. According to Lesley, both these vessels had been captured by Barton. The ships whose names occur in the Rolls[3] were, in fact, private property of either Scottish or foreign traders. But the Rolls also afford evidence of the King's activity in building ships for himself, which is still more fully brought out by the entries in the Treasurer's Books. He seems to have commenced his shipbuilding with a row barge at Dumbarton, which is described in detail in the Treasurer's Accounts.[1] In 1508–9 the woods of Darnaway were being felled for the construction of the King's ships.[2] In the Account of Fife for 1511–2 a sum was allowed the Chamberlain for his expenses in iron, stones, wood, and hire of waggons and freight from Falkland to Leith for the necessaries of "the King's ship," no doubt the "St Michael,"[3] and more wood was shipped from Urquhart, in Ross,[4] while large sums were entered in the King's Household Books which really went to the victualling of the ships [£219, 9s. 4d. and £768, 16s. 2d., £149, 2s. 8d.][5] and for corn, and were all paid out of the customs of Edinburgh before 24th July 1512, with the result of a large deficit in that account. In the foreign correspondence of James we meet with frequent requests for wood for ships, both from the French and the Danish Kings. With all his efforts, James did not succeed in equipping a large navy. "If Barton and Brownhill do not come home," writes Dacre on 7th August 1512, "the King of Scots has not ten ships;" but from a letter of the Captain of Norham dated 11th September it appears they had returned, though Brownhill again sailed[6] to Flanders before 14th February 1513.[7] The full number of the Scottish navy was 16 ships with tops, 10 smaller craft, "balangeris" or sloops, without forecastles, and crayers or barks. The lowest estimate of the English navy at this date makes it consist of 24 ships, carrying 6480 sailors and mariners, and with a portage of 8460.[1] The names of these, besides the "St Michael," have been preserved. The "James" and the "Margaret" and the "Ship of Lynn,"[2] which had been taken by Brownhill.[3] One of the smaller craft was the "Rose Galley,"[4] which had been built as a tender to the "Great St Michael." The command was, by a fatal error, given, not to Andrew Wood or Robert Barton, but to the Earl of Arran and Gordon of Letterfurry, a son of Huntly. Lord Fleming of Cumbernauld was captain of the "Margaret," Lord Ross of Hacket of the "James." Arran, though Pitscottie calls him "Admiral of the Fleet," never held that office, but, from his rank, had the chief command. Instead of sailing direct to France as instructed, he went round Scotland to Carrickfergus, which he sacked, and after "playing himself" at Ayr for forty days, arrived in France too late to have any effect on the war. The traditions of feudal service were too strong for the longer service necessary in this new branch of war. According to Pitscottie, James sent Wood to supersede him, but he refused to give up the fleet. The "St Michael" was sold on 2d April 1514 at Paris by Albany the Regent to the French King, for 40,000 francs of Tours.[1]

What became of the other vessels is not known. The navy of James IV., built at so great a cost, mysteriously disappears from history. Its disappearance, like the uselessness of Mons Meg, which was laid up in the Castle, and subsequently burst when a salute was fired by an English gunner in honour of the Duke of York, are emblems of a policy which aimed at more than it could accomplish.

But while the artillery and the navy, the scientific arms of future war, first appear in Scotland at this period—the former to be captured without firing a shot with effect, and the latter to be carried off by an insubordinate commander—the Scottish army still consisted chiefly of the feudal levy or array. James had no mercenaries and no allies; De La Motte, the French ambassador, was the only foreigner slain. His force consisted of the royal vassals, who were bound by their tenure to military service both in person and with a certain number of followers. The limit of service outside of the kingdom, called Servitium Forinsecum, to distinguish it from service within, Servitium Scoticanum, was, in Scotland as in England,[2] for forty days, after which the vassals were entitled to return home. This explains the short duration of all James's campaigns, which were raids rather than wars. The obligation of the Scottish baron, as it continued down to this period, is well brought out in a charter in the present volume.[1] John Grant of Freuchy, was bound, by the charter of 8th December 1509 to his extensive estates, to supply "a lance with its supports ('unam suffultam lancîam'), viz., three sufficient horsemen, for each £10 of land in the time of war beyond the kingdom, along with all fencible persons ('defensalibus personabus') living on the lands, at the command of the King." He was also to build a castle at Urquhart, with a forewall of stone and lime. The royal burghs, as well as the royal barons holding directly of the King, were also bound to send their military force. There is, as usual, great discrepancy between the different accounts of the numbers engaged at Flodden, which vary from 80,000, the number stated by Hall, the English chronicler, to 10,000[2] in one of the Scottish accounts. But the Scottish writers, after the defeat, diminished the proportions of their army, and there can be little doubt that Hall's estimate more nearly answers to the real number. The names of the commanders, as well as those who fell, clearly prove that every district of Scotland was represented. The only baron who is said to have left before the battle was old Angus, Bell-the-Cat, and his sons and vassals remained, so there seems no authority for Pinkerton's statement that the Scottish host melted away till there remained not above 30,000. Hume, the Chamberlain, along with Huntly, commanded the left wing, consisting probably of the men of the Merse, Berwick, and the Borders, along with those of Aberdeen. Crawford and Montrose, and probably Errol, the Constable of Scotland, led the next division, consisting of the men of Fife, Perth, and Forfarshires. The King in person commanded the centre, probably composed of the men of Stirling, Linlithgow, and the Lothians, supported by Lord Bothwell with the cavalry in the rear. Lennox and Argyle headed the Highlanders of the West, and formed the right wing. The names of the leaders indicate the territorial division of the troops.

Every district of the country also contributed to the numbers of the slain, and attest the huge proportions of the carnage. No prisoners were taken. Besides the King there fell thirteen Earls, at least as many Lords, and a still greater number of lesser barons and gentlemen. Two Bishops, St Andrews and the Isles; two Abbots, Inchaffray and Kilwinning; and the Dean of Glasgow, represented the clergy, whom the English satirist blames for taking part in the battle. Edinburgh lost its Provost Lauder; and if we may credit Pitscottie's story of the summons of Plotcock, only one of its burgesses came home. The Western Highlanders, whose rash onset contributed to the defeat, fell in large numbers, besides several of their chiefs—MacIan of Ardnamurchan, Campbell of Glenurchy, and MacLean of Dowart. Few of the men of Caithness returned, and it was long deemed unlucky to cross the Ord with green, the colour they wore when led by their Earl to the muster. The descendants of the tall borderers of Ettrick, the flowers of the forest, and the stalwart burghers of Hawick and Selkirk, preserved the sad memory in songs. Masses were said for the dead in every church throughout the realm, and the title-deeds of almost every estate, as well as the public records of the commencement of the next reign, prove that scarcely a family of note did not mourn more than one of its members. It is probable that Hall, who reckons the total loss at 10,000, did not greatly exaggerate. "I never read," wrote Lyndsay, "in tragede nor storie, at ane journaye so many nobles slain for the defence and lufe of their soverane."

James had led them to their fate, and his faults as a General, narrated in every history, exceeded even his faults as a Sovereign, which have been brought into clearer light by the publication of the Records. Yet Buchanan records the popular feeling—"As he was dear to all whilst living, so he was mightily lamented at his death, and the remembrance of him stuck so fast in the minds of men, that the like was not known of any other King we have ever heard or read of." But the reflections which follow are nearer the verdict of impartial history, and are confirmed by the Accounts now printed. "It is probable that this happened by making a comparison with the evils which preceded his reign, or else were likely speedily to follow, considering also his eminent virtues. Nay, his vices were popular, and easily deceived vulgar minds by a specious resemblance and affinity to virtue. . . . . To avoid the name of a covetous Prince, which his father incurred, he laboured to insinuate himself into the goodwill of the vulgar by sumptuous buildings and feastings, by costly pageants and considerable grants, so that his Exchequer was brought very low."

It is a duty as well as a pleasure to acknowledge the aid the writer has received from the Historical Curator's intimate knowledge of the Records, and of the minutest details of the History of Scotland. To Mr Dickson's generous communication of this knowledge, and to frequent conversations with the late Mr Burnett on the subject of the Records, the greater part of whatever value the present Preface may possess is due. The writer has also to thank Mr Archibald Anderson, M.A., and Mr George Law, LL.B., Advocates, Mr Alexander Laing, LL.D., of Newburgh, and Mr Gregory Smith, M.A., for reading proofs or other friendly assistance. Mr

Gregory Smith's work, "The Days of James IV.," is destined, it may be hoped, to be the commencement of a more thorough study, both in Schools and Colleges, of Scottish History in the Contemporary Records.
